sup-plé-mént, v.t. [SUPPLEMENT, s.] To fill up, supply, or complete by additions; to add something to, as a book or writing.

Supplements in this sense are frequently used to keep a work of reference up to date, when so voluminous as to make a re-setting of the work inadvisable. This is done in the case of the large dictionaries, new coined words and those omitted being given from time to time in supplements. The same is done in the case of encyclopædias, in certain cases annual supplementary volumes being issued, in order to keep the information closely up to date, and introduce new subjects of interest. When such a work becomes cumbersome by the extent of its supplementary new editions are occasionally issued in which the supplementary matter is brought into the text.

sup-plé-mént-ál, sup-plé-mént-ar-y, a. [Eng. supplement, a.; -al, -ary.] Of the nature of a supplement; serving to supplement, fill up, or complete by additions; added to supply what is deficient.

sū-pra-crē-tā'-čč-ōūs (or ceous as shūs), a. [Pref. supra-, and Eng. cretaceous.] Supracretaceous (q.v.).

Geol. (Of strata): Above the Cretaceous beds. The term was introduced by Sir H. De la Beche, and was largely in use before the importance of those newer strata was understood; now called Tertiary (q.v.).

sū-pra-fō-li-ā'-čē-ōūs (or ceous as shūs), sū-pra-fō-li-ār, a. [Pref. supra-, and Eng. foliaceous, foliar (q.v.).] Suprafoliaceous (q.v.).

Bot.: Growing upon a leaf.

sū-pra-fō-li-ār, a. [SUPRAFOLIACEOUS.]

sū-pra-lāp-sār-ī-an, a. & a. [Lat. supra = above; lapsus = a fall, a lapse (q.v.), and Eng. suff. -arian.] Supralapsarian (q.v.).

A. As adj.: Of or pertaining to the Supralapsarians or their doctrine. "The supralapsarian was seemed to me of the two the more moderate; the rigid supradapsarian doctrine would never find entertainment in my thoughts." Hammond: Works, I. 60a.

B. As substantive:

Church Hist. (PL): Calvinists who held that God for his own glory eternally decreed the fall of man and the consequent introduction of sin into the world, and that the election of some to everlasting life, with the rejection of others, was formed "beyond" or before, and was in no way consequent or dependent upon the foreseen fall of man. Of this school were Beza, Francis Gomarus, and Voetius. Opposed to Infra-lapsarian (q.v.).

sū-pra-lāp-sār-ī-an-īsm, s. [Eng. supralapsarian; -ism.] The doctrine or the tenets of the Supralapsarians.

sū-pra-lāp-sā-r-y, s. & a. [SUPRALAPSARIAN.] The same as SUPRALAPSARIAN.

sū-pra-mūn'-dāne, a. [Pref. supra-, and Eng. mundane (q.v.).] Supramundane (q.v.). Situated or being above the world; celestial.

"The later Platonists supposed the world and all the inferior gods (as Plato and the Pythagoreans, some supramundane deities), to proceed, by way of emanation, without any temporary production, from a superior cause." Waterland: Works, I. 8a.

sū-pra-nāt-u-rāl, a. [Pref. supra-, and Eng. natural.] Supranatural; transcending human power or ability.

¶ The supranatural: That which transcends human power or ability.

"Kant . . . theoretically completely excluded the supranatural as something to which reason could enter into no relation whatever." Schaff: Encyc. Rel. Knowl., iii. 1, 995.

sū-pra-nāt-u-rāl-īsm, s. [Ger. supra-naturalismus, from Lat. supra = above, and Eccl. Lat. naturalismus = rationalism.] Supranaturalism (q.v.).

Church Hist.: A term first employed in Germany towards the close of the eighteenth century to designate the belief of orthodox Protestants. Now used in a much wider sense, so as to include any doctrine appealing to revelation as its authority.

"At its first appearance the opposite of rationalism was not designated as supranaturalism, but simply as protestantism. As the champions, however, of protestantism, that is, of the theology based upon Scripture as the divine revelation, generally designated their adversaries, not as rationalists, but as naturalists, it naturally came to pass that their own views were designated as supranaturalism." Schaff: Encyc. Rel. Knowl., iii. 1, 995.

sū-pra-nāt-u-rāl-ist, a. & a. [Eng. supra-natural (ism); -ist.] Supranaturalist (q.v.).

A. As substantive:

Church Hist.: One who believes in revealed, as distinct from natural religion. [SUPRANATURALISM.]

"What reason cannot comprehend and accept can never form part of the rationalistic convictions. . . . The supranaturalist, on the other hand, is no less in harmony with his fundamental maxim. In matters of religion, Scripture is to him what reason is to the rationalist. Though he too employs reason, he employs it only to search and judge those claims to a divine origin which Scripture puts forth; and as soon as that point has been decided, and he feels convinced that Scripture contains the direct teachings of God, it becomes his highest, his sole authority." Schaff: Encyc. Rel. Knowl., iii. 1, 995.

B. As adj.: Founded on or pertaining to revelation; accepting revelation.

"The successors of their supranaturalist adversaries." Schaff: Encyc. Rel. Knowl., iii. 1, 995.

sū-pra-nāt-u-rāl-ist-ic, a. [Pref. supra-, and Eng. naturalistic (q.v).] Supranaturalistic (q.v.).

"The supranaturalistic and rationalistic opinions." Schneus: Life of Jesus (ed. Evans), I. 11.

sū-pra-ōc-čip-it-āl, a. [Pref. supra-, and Eng. occipital (q.v.).] Supraoccipital (q.v.).

Anat.: Situated or being above the occiput. supraoccipital bone, s.

Compar. Anat.: The bone which completes the first cranial segment above, answering to the occipital bone in man.

sū-pra-prō-tēst, s. [Pref. supra-, and Eng. protest (q.v.).] Supraprotest (q.v.).

Law: An acceptance of a bill by a third person, after protest for non-acceptance by the drawer.

sū-pra-rā-tion-āl-īsm, s. [Ger. supra-rationalismus.] A word suggested as a more fitting term to express what is known as supranaturalism. (See extract under SUPRANATURALISM.)

sū-pra-rē-nāl, a. [Pref. supra-, and Eng. renal (q.v.).] Supra-renal (q.v.).

Anat.: Situated or being above the kidneys.

1. Compar. Anat.: Two flattened bodies of crescentic or beat triangular form, one surmounting each kidney, attaining a disproportionately large size in the fetal state in man and the Quadrumana. The right capsule is placed lower down than the left. They are an inch and a quarter to an inch and three-quarters high, an inch and a quarter wide, and two to three lines thick. Their weight in an adult is one or two drachma. They are fibrous, composed principally of simple or closed vesicles resembling the secreting glands, except that they have no duct. Their function is unknown. Called also Suprarenal Glands or Bodies.

2. Pathol.: In 1855, Dr. Thomas Addison attempted to prove that a disease, often attended by bronze skin, and fatal in from six months to five years, has its seat in the suprarenal capsules. [BAZONZED, ¶.]

sū-pra-scāp-u-lar-ī, sū-pra-scāp-u-lar, a. [Pref. supra-, and Eng. scapular, scapular (q.v.).] Suprascapular (q.v.).

Anat.: Situated or being above the scapula: as, the suprascapular ligament.

sū-pra-spin'-al, sū-pra-spin'-ōūs, a. [Pref. supra-, and Eng. spinal, spinous (q.v.).] Supraspinous (q.v.).

Anatomy:

1. Above the spine.

2. Above the spine or ridge of the scapula, or shoulder-blade: as, the supraspinous fossa and ligaments.

sū-pra-stēr-nāl, a. [Pref. supra-, and Eng. sternal (q.v.).] Suprasternal (q.v.).

Anat.: Situated above the sternum: as, the suprasternal nerve.

sū-pra-troch'-lē-ār, a. [Pref. supra-, and Eng. trochlear (q.v.).] Supratrochlear (q.v.).

Anat.: Situated above the trochlea of the orbit: as, the supratrochlear branch of the ophthalmic nerve.

sū-pra-vī-šion, s. [Pref. supra-, and Eng. vision (q.v).] Supervision (q.v.).

sū-pra-vī-ōr, s. [Pref. supra-, and -visor as in superior.] A supervisor, an overseer.

"They made Arceus titular, and Lyxander supravisor of him." —Bp. Taylor: Sermon 23.

sū-pra-vūl-gar, a. [Pref. supra-, and Eng. vulgar (q.v).] Being above the vulgar or common people.

"None of these motives can prevail with a man to furnish himself with supravulgar and noble qualities." —Collier.

suprēm-ā-čy, s. [Fr. suprématic, from suprême = supreme (q.v).] Supremacy (q.v.). The quality or state of being supreme, or in the highest station of power; highest or supreme authority or power.

¶ (1) Oath of supremacy: An oath required to be taken in Great Britain along with the oath of allegiance, denying the supremacy of the pope in ecclesiastical or temporal matters in this realm. It has now been greatly modified and simplified.

(2) Papal supremacy:

Eccl. & Church Hist.: The authority, partly spiritual and partly temporal, which the Pope, as bishop of Rome and successor of St. Peter, claims to exercise over the clergy, and, through them, over the laity, of the whole world. The development of this supremacy dates from the time when Christianity became the State religion of the Roman empire under Constantine. Its influence was great in England under the Norman kings, and reached its highest point in the reign of John (1199-1216), from which period it began to decline, and received its death-blow from the Act of Supremacy (26 Henry VIII., c. 1).

(3) Royal supremacy:

Church Hist.: The supremacy in the Church of England, as by law established, of the temporal power in all causes purely temporal, and in the temporal accidents of spiritual things. (Shipley.) By 26 Henry VIII., c. 1, the king was declared to be the "only supreme Head on earth of the Church of England," though it was expressly declared that he did not "pretend to take any power from the successors of the apostles that was given them by God." In the same year (1535) Fisher, Bishop of Rochester, and Sir Thomas More were beheaded for denying the royal claim. On the accession of Elizabeth the title was kept in the background; but the supremacy of the sovereign in all causes, as well ecclesiastical as civil, was asserted. The Royal Supremacy was one of the main causes of the civil war in the seventeenth century; it received a check at the Revolution of 1688, which enforced toleration of Nonconformity, but in the latter half of the nineteenth century more than one clergyman has been committed to prison for disobeying the ruling of the law courts in ecclesiastical matters.

su-prême, *su-pream, a. [Fr. suprême, from Lat. supremus = highest, from super = above; Sp. and Ital. supremo.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. The highest in authority or power; holding the highest place in authority, power, or government.

"Nevertheless, there cannot really be more than one supreme power in a society."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xxiii.

2. Highest or most extreme in degree; highest possible; utmost.

And his chief glory, was the gospel theme."
Cowper: Conversation, etc.

† II. Bot.: Situated at the highest point or part.

¶ 1. The Supreme:

(1) The highest of beings; the sovereign of the universe; God.

(2) The highest point or pitch.

"'Tis the supreme of power."

Keats: Sleep & Poetry.

2. Supreme Court: The highest court of the United States, established by the Constitution, its purpose being to decide upon the Constitutionality of Acts of Congress, and also to serve as the final court of appeal in suits of a national character. Each state has its Supreme Court, which performs like duties within that state. The Supreme Court of Judicature in England is a court of final appeal.

• sūr-cū-dānt, a. [O. Fr. surcuidant.] [SURCUDANT.] Arrogant, insolent, presumptuous. "Full of vauynglorious and surcudant elacyon." Skelton: Replecyon, l. 202.

• sūr-cū-lāte, v. [Lat. surculatus, pa. par. of surculo, from surculus = a shoot, a twig.] To prune.

• sūr-cū-lā-tion, s. [SURCULATE.] The act of pruning. "When Inlition and grafting, In the text, is applied unto the olive tree, it hath an emphatical sense, very agreeable unto that tree, which is best propagated that way; not at all by surculacion." —Browne's Miscellany Tracts, l.

sūr-cū-lōse, sūr-cū-lōis, a. [Lat. surculosus, from surculus = a twig, a shoot.] Bot.: Full of shoots or twigs.

sūr-cū-lūs (pl. sūr-cū-lī), s. [Lat.] Bot.: A sucker (q.v.).

sūr-cūr-rent, a. [Fr. sur = above, and Lat. currens, pr. par. of curro = to run.] Bot.: Running up the stem as a leafy expansion. (The opposite of decurrent q.v.)

sūrd, a. & s. [Lat. surdus = deaf; hence, deaf to reason, irrational.]

A. As adjective:

* I. Ordinary Language:

1. Not having the sense of hearing; deaf. "A surd and earless generation of men, stupid unto all instruction." —Browne.

2. Unheard.

"Surd modes of articulation." —Kerrick (Goodrich)

II. Technically:

1. Math.: Applied to a quantity not capable of being expressed in rational numbers: as, a surd expression or quantity. [B. 1.]

2. Phonetics: Uttered with breath and not with voice; not sonant, toneless; applied, specifically, to the hard, mute consonants of the alphabet. [B. 2.]

B. As substantive:

1. Math.: An irrational quantity; a quantity which is incommensurable to unity; the root of a quantity when that quantity is not a complete power of the dimension required by the index of the root; hence, the roots of such quantities cannot be expressed by rational numbers. Thus $\sqrt{2}$, or the square root of 2; $\sqrt[3]{4}$, or the cube root of 4, &c., are surds.

2. Phonetics: A consonantal sound uttered with breath and not with voice; a non-sonant consonant, as p, f, s, t, k.

• sūrd-al, a. [Eng. surd; -al.] The same as SURD (q.v.).

• sur-din-y, s. [SARDINE.]

sūr-dī-tās, s. [Lat.] Deafness; hardness of hearing.

• sūrd-i-tŷ, s. [Fr. surdité, from Lat. surditatem, accus. of surditas.] Deafness; hardness of hearing.

sūre (s as sh), *sur, *seur, a. & adv. [O. Fr. sur, seur, segur, from Lat. securus = secure (q.v.); Fr. sūr.]

A. As adjective:

* 2. Betrothed; engaged to marry.

"The king was sure to dame Elizabeth Lucy, and her husband before God." —More: Hist. Richard III.

3. Perfectly confident or undoubting; certain of one's facts, position, or the like; certainly knowing and believing; trusting implicitly; having no fear of being deceived, disappointed, or found at fault; assured.

"I am sure she is not boricd."

Shakesp.: Two Gentlemen, iv. 2.

4. Fit, proper, or deserving to be depended on; certain not to disappoint or come short of expectation; certain, infallible, stable; not liable to change, loss, or failure.

"The testimony of the Lord is sure." —Psalms xix. 7.

5. Certain to find, gain, or retain: as, To be sure of life or health.

B. As adverb:

1. Safely, securely.

"Open perils surest answered." Shakesp.: Julius Cæsar, iv. 1.

2. Unfailingly, infallibly, surely.

"I know most sure my art is not past power." Shakesp.: Henry VI., v. 1.

3. Firmly, securely.

"To . . . sure bind this knot of sanity." Shakesp.: Henry VI., v. 1.

¶ It is frequently inserted by way of asseveration.

"Tis pleasant, sure, to see one's name in print." Byron: English Bards & Scotch Reviewers, 51.

¶ For the difference between sure and certain, see CERTAIN.

¶ 1. Sure as a gun: Most certainly, most assuredly; unfailingly; absolutely certain. (Colloq.)

2. To be sure: Without doubt; certainly; of course.

3. To make sure:

(1) To make certain or secure; to secure so that there can be no possibility of failure or disappointment.

"Give diligence to make your calling and election sure." —2 Peter 1. 10.

(2) To make fast by betrothal; to betroth.

• sūre-bŷ (s as sh), s. [SUBREPAY.]

• sūre-ēd-lŷ (s as sh), adv. [Eng. sure; -ly.] Certainly, safely, securely.

"He that walks moderately, is always with himself, directeth his business with better advantage, and more surely and cheerfully." —Lennard: Of Wisdom, bk. II., ch. II., § 10.

sūre-foot-ēd (s as sh), a. [Eng. sure, and footed.]

1. Lit.: Treading firmly; having a firm, steady tread; not liable to stumble, slide, or fall.

2. Fig.: Not liable to slip or err; trustworthy.

"That safe and sure-footed interpreter, Alex. Aphroditus, expounds his master's meaning." —Cudworth: Intell. System, p. 170.

sūre-lŷ (s as sh), *sure-lye, adv. [Eng. sure; -ly.]

* 1. Firmly, stably, securely.

"That I may surely keep mine oath." Shakesp.: Taming of the Shrew, iv. 2.

2. Certainly, infallibly, assuredly.

"In the day that thou testest thereof thou shalt surely die." —Genesis ii. 17.

¶ Surely is frequently used by way of asseveration: as—

"Surely It is a sleepy language." Shakesp.: Tempest, ii. 1.

Or, as nearly equivalent to an interrogative; as, Surely, you do not think so? = You do not think so, do you? or, as expressing a doubt in the mind of the speaker: as, Surely he cannot have said so?

• sūre-mēt (s as sh), s. [Eng. sure; -ment.] Security for payment.

"I you release, madame, In to your hand, Quilt every surement and every bond." Chaucer: C. T., 11, 837.

sūre-ness (s as sh), a. [Eng. sure; -ness.] The quality or state of being sure or certain; certainty, security.

"They were in doubt which was the right way they were obliged to keep, and therefore for sureness they would keep both." —Sharp: Sermons, vol. iv., ser. 15.

• sūres-bŷ (s as sh), s. [Eng. sure; s connect, and boy.] Modelled on the Shakespearian word rudesby (q.v.).] One to be sure of; a person to be relied upon.

"There is one which is surebys, as they say, to serve, if anything will serve." —Bradford in Goodrich & Porter.

• sūre-tī-shīp (sū as shū), s. [SURETSHIP.]

sūre-tŷ (s as sh), *seurte, *sure-tee, *sure-tye, s. [O. Fr. seürte, segurte; Fr. sureté, from Lat. securitatem, accus. of securitas, from securus = secure (q.v.).]

I. Ordinary Language:

* 1. Security, safety.

"They were layne to resort to their shippes for their seürte." —Fabian: Chronicle, ch. xviii.

2. Certainty, indubitableness.

"Know of a surety that thy seed shall be a stranger in a land that is not theirs." —Genesis xv. 13.

3. Security against loss or damage; security for payment.

"And he shal hau Custance In marriage, And certain gold, I not what quantitee, And hereto finde: sufficient suretye." Chaucer: C. T., 4, 683.

4. That which makes sure, secure, firm, or certain; assurance; ground of stability or security.

"Our state Hold, as you yours, while our obedience holds: On other surety none." Milton: P. L., v. 633.

* 5. Evidence, ratification, confirmation, guarantee.

"She called the saints to surety. That she would never put it from her finger, Unless she gave it to yourself." Shakesp.: All's Well that Ends Well, v. 3.

6. In the same sense as II.

"I'll be his surety." Shakesp.: Tempest, i. 3.

7. One who takes the place of another; a substitute, a hostage.

"In him our Surety seemed to say; Behold, I bear your sinus away." Cowper: Olney Hymns, ix.

II. Law: One who is bound with and for another who is primarily liable, and who is called the principal; one who enters into a bond or recognizance to answer for the appearance of another in court, or for his payment of a debt, or for the performance of some act, and who, in case of the failure of the principal, is liable to pay the debt and damages; a bondsman, a bail.

¶ (1) Surety of good behaviour: A recognizance or obligation to the crown entered into by a person with one or more sureties before some competent judge of record, whereby the parties acknowledge themselves to be indebted to the crown in a specified amount, with condition to be void if the defendant shall demean and behave himself well, either generally or specially, for the time therein limited. It includes surety for the peace and something more. A justice may bind over all night-walkers, such as keep suspicious company, or are reported to be pilferers or robbers, common drunkards, cheats, idle vagabonds, and other persons whose misbehaviour may reasonably bring them within the general words of the statute as persons not of good fame. (Blackstone: Comment., bk. iv., ch. 18.)

"Any justice of the peace may, ex-officio, bind all those to keep the peace who in his presence make any affray; or threaten to kill or beat another; or contend together with angry words; or are brought before him by the constable for a breach of the peace in his presence; and all such persons as, having been before bound to the peace, have broken it and forfeited their recognizance. Also, whenever any private man has just cause to fear that another will do him a corporal injury, or procure others so to do; or he may demand surety of the peace against such person; and every justice of the peace is bound to grant it, if he who demands it will make oath that he is actually under fear of death or bodily harm. This is called swearing the peace against another; and, if the party does not find such sureties as his justice in his discretion shall require, he may immediately be committed till he does, or until the expiration of a year; for persons committed to prison for not entering into recognizances or finding sureties to keep the peace can in no case be detained for more than twelve months. Such recognizance, when given, may be forfeited by any actual violence, or menace even, to the person of him who demanded it, if it be a special recognizance; or, if the recognizance be general, by any unlawful action whatsoever, that either is or tends to a breach of the peace." —Blackstone: Comment., bk. iv., ch. 13.

• sūre-tŷ (s as sh), v. t. [SURETY, s.] To be surety or security for; to guarantee.

sūre-tŷ-shīp, *sūrc-tī-shīp (sū as shū), s. [Eng. surety; -ship.] The state or position of being surety; the obligation of a person to answer for the debt, fault, or non-performance of another, and to make good any loss occasioned thereby.

"If here not clear'd, a suretyship can bail, Condemned debtors from th' eternal jail." Denham: Of Prudence, 137.

sūrf (1), s. [Etym. doubtful. According to Skeat, the more correct form is suffe (q.v.), for sough = a rush or rushing noise, from A.S. swōgan = to make a rushing noise.] [Swoon, Sough (2), s.] The swell of the sea which breaks upon the shore or upon sandbanks or rocks.

"The rising of the waves against the shore, is called by mothers the surf of the sea." —Goldsmith: Animated Nature, pt. I., ch. xvii.

surf-boat, s. A peculiarly constructed boat for landing or pushing off through the surf.

surf-boatman, s. One who manages a surf-boat.

"It is an erroneous notion that the experience of the sailor qualifies him for a surf-boatman." —Scrubner's Magazine, Jan., 1850, p. 323.

surf-duck, s. [SURF-SCOTER.]

fāte, fāt, fāre, amidst, whāt, fāll, father; wē, wēt, hēre, camēl, hēr, thēre; pine, pīt, sīre, sīr, marine; gō, pōt, or, wōre, wōlf, wōrk, whō, sōn; mūte, oūb, cūre, unīte, cūr, rāle, fūll; trŷ, Sŷrian. æ, œ = ē; ey = ā; qu = kw.

surf-scooter, s.

Ornith.: Colonia perspicillata; An United States duck, common on the Atlantic coast, and extending its migrations to Europe. Length about twenty-one inches; plumage black, with an oval patch of white on the top of the head and on the back of the neck; beak, legs, and toes orange-yellow. Called also Surf-duck.

surf (2), s. [SOUGH (1), s.]

Agria.: The bottom or conduit of a drain. (Prov.) surf-face, s. & a. [Fr., from sur = above, upon, and face (Lat. facies) = face; cf. Lat. superficies, from super = above, and facies = a face. Surface and superficies are therefore doublets.]

A. As substantive:

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Literally:

(1) The upper face of anything; the exterior part of anything that has length and breadth; one of the limits that terminate a solid; the superficies, the outside; as, the surface of a cylinder, the surface of the sea, &c. Popularly surface is used to designate not only the superficies, or exterior part of anything, but also a certain thickness or depth below the outside: as, To pare off the surface of a field; the surface of the earth, &c.

"His passions like th' wat'ry stores that sleep Beneath the smiling surface of the deep."
Cowper: Hope, 184.

(2) In the same sense as II. 2.

2. Fig.: Outward or external appearance; that which appears or is presented on a slight or superficial view, without examination: as, On the surface of it the proposition appears fair.

II. Technically:

1. Fort.: That part of the side which is terminated by the flank prolonged, and the angle of the nearest bastion.

2. Geom.: That which has length and breadth only, and so distinguished from a line which has length only, and a solid which has length, breadth, and thickness. Surfaces are distinguished algebraically by the nature and order of their equations: thus a plane surface is a surface of the first order; a curved surface is a surface of the second order. Surfaces are also distinguished by their mode of generation.

3. Physics: When geometrical reasoning is applied to the propositions of physics, the word surface is used in the ordinary geometric sense, that is, length and breadth without thickness (2.), but when the abstract is modified into the concrete, the surface in physics has, in an indefinitely small amount or thickness, depth, a geometrical surface existing only as a mental conception.

B. As adj.: Of or pertaining to the surface; situated or being on the surface; external; hence, figuratively, superficial, specious, insincere: as, mere surface loyalty.

¶ For the difference between surface and superficies, see SUPERFICIES.

¶ (1) Curved surface: A surface which may be cut by a plane through any given point, so that the line of common section of the plane and surface may be a curve, as the surface of a sphere, cylinder, or cone.

(2) Developable surface: A surface that can be unwrapped in a plane without any doubling of parts over one another, or separation, as the surface of the cylinder and cone.

(3) Plane surface: [PLANE, s., A. II. 2.]

(4) Ruled surface: A surface described by the motion of a straight line, which neither remains parallel to a given line, nor always passes through a given point, as a conoidal surface.

(5) Tubular surface: A surface generated by a circle of a given radius, which moves with its centre on a given curve, and its plane at right angles to the tangent of that curve.

(6) Undevelopable surface: A surface that cannot be developed in the plane.

surface-chuck, s.

Lith.: A face-plate chuck to which a flat object is dogged for turning.

surface-condenser, s.

1. Steam-eng.: A chamber or congeries of pipes in which steam from the cylinder is condensed.

2. A steam-heated apparatus, consisting of pipes or chambers over which a solution is conducted in order that its watery particles may be driven off.

surface-gauge, s. An implement for testing the accuracy of plane surfaces.

surface-grub, s.

Entom.: The grub or caterpillar of Triphena pronuba. [TRIPHENA, UNDERWING.]

surface-joint, s. A joint uniting the ends or edges of metallic sheets or plates.

surface-man, s.

Rail-eng.: A person whose duty it is to keep the permanent way in order.

surface-plane, s.

Wood-work.: A form of planing-machine for truing and smoothing the surface of an object run beneath the rotary cutter on the bed of the planer.

surface-printing, s. Printing from an inked surface in contradistinction to the plate-printing process, in which the lines are filled with ink, the surface cleaned, and the ink absorbed from the lines by pressure upon the plate. Books, newspapers, woodcuts, and lithographs are all surface-printed; Bank of England notes have been printed by this process since January 1, 1855.

surface-roller, s.

Calico-print.: The engraved cylinder used in calico-printing.

surface-twitch, s.

Bot.: (1) Polygonum aviculare; (2) Agrostis stolonifera angustifolia. [BRITEN & HOLLAND.]

surface-water, s. Water which collects on the surface of the ground; it is usually run off into sewers or drains.

surface-working, s.

Mining.: The operation of digging for gold or other minerals on the top soil.

surf-face, v.t. [SURFACE, s.]

1. To put a surface on; to give a surface to; espec., to give a fine surface to; to make smooth or polished.

2. To work the surface of, as ground, in searching for gold, &c.

†3. To bring to or place on the surface; to raise to the surface.

"To surface the dustuff now accumulated."—Money Market Review, Aug. 29, 1855.

surf-faç-ër, s. [Eng. surface(s), v.; -er.]

1. A machine for planing and giving a surface to wood.

2. One who digs for gold, &c., in the surface soil.

* surf, *sur-fell, *sur-fis, *sur-fyll, v.t. [Prob. corrupted from sulphur.] To wash, as the face, with a cosmetic, supposed to have been prepared from sulphur.

"She shall no oftener powder her hair, surfell her cheeks, cleanse her teeth, or conform the hairs of her eye-brows, &c."—Ford: Love's Sacrifice, II. 1.

surf-feit, *sur-fet, *sur-feyte, v.t. & i. [SURFEIT, s.]

A. Transitive:

I. Lit.: To feed to excess so as to overload and oppress the stomach, and derange the functions of the system; to overfeed so as to produce sickness or nausea.

II. Figuratively:

* 1. To overburthen; to weigh down.
"No mors would watch, when sleepe so surfeted Their leaden ey-lids."
Chapman: Homer: Odyssey II.

2. To fill to satiety or disgust; to cloy.
"To surfet and injure ourselves by excessive indulgence."—Knox: Sermons, vol. VI., ser. 20.

* B. Intransitive:

1. Lit.: To be fed till the system is oppressed, and sickness or nausea results.
"Who before pampered himself with all sorts of delicacies even to surfetting."—Sharp: Sermons, vol. VI., ser. 3.

2. Fig.: To feel uneasy in consequence of excess.
"Love surfets not, just like a glutton dies."
Shakesp.: Venus & Adonis, 602 surf-feit, *sur-fet, *sor-falt, s. [O. Fr. soifait = excess, orig. p. par. of soifaire, sur- faire; to overprize, to make of excessive value; O. Fr. sur; Fr. sur = above, and fait, p. par. of faire (Lat. facio) = to do, to make, to deem.]

I. Literally:

1. Excess in eating and drinking; an excessive or gluttonous meal by which the stomach is overloaded, and the digestion deranged.

"He was half-killed with a surfet of shene pippin."
—Thackeray: English Humourists; Sweet.

2. Fullness and oppression of the system, arising from excessive or gluttonous eating or drinking.

"So prodigious in quantity, as would at another time have produced a fever or surfet."—Anson: Voyages, bk. II., ch. II.

II. Fig.: Disgust caused by satiety; satiety, nausea.

"Zelmaus thought it not good for his stomach to receive a surfet of too much favour."—Stukey: Arcadia, bk. III.

* surfet-swelled, a. Swelled out with gluttony or other over-indulgence. [Shakesp.: 2 Henry IV., v. 5.]

* surfet-water, s. Water for the cure of surfets.

"A little cold-distilled poppy-water, which is the true surfet-water, with ease and abstinence, often ends distempers in the beginning."—Locke.

surf-feit-ër, s. [Eng. surfet, v.; -er.] A glutton, a reveller, a rioter.

"I did not think This am'rous surfet'er would have found'd his helm."
Shakesp.: Antony & Cleopatra, II. 1.

* surf-flew (ew as ô), s. [Pref. sur- (2), and flee.] (See extract.)

"What usually are termed therein [the Gravel coat of arms] rests, being the handles of spears (most honourable in tilting to break them nearest therunto) are called by some critics surfesies, being the necessary appendants to organs conveying wind unto them—it, but is seemeth their dubious form as represented in the scutcheon doth, ex aquo, answer to both."—Fuller: Worthies; Cornwall.

surf-man, s. [Eng. surf (1), and man.] A sailor who manages a surf-boat (q. v.).

"Rescued from drowning by the surfmen, who rushed into the breakers and safely dragged them ashore."—Scribner's Magazine, Jan., 1889, p. 332.

surf-man-ship, s. [Eng. surfman; -ship.] The art or skill in managing a surf-boat (q. v.).

"Surfmanship was not a standard of qualification."—Scribner's Magazine, Jan., 1889, p. 334.

surf-y, a. [Eng. surf (1), s.; -y.] Consisting in or abounding with surf; resembling surf; foaming.

surge, s. [Lat. surgo = to rise; O. Fr. sourgeon = a spring.]

I. Ordinary Language:

* 1. A rising, a spring, a fountain.

"All great rivers are gurgled and assembled of driers surges and springs of water."—Berners: Froissart; Cronycle, vol. I., ch. I.

2. A large wave or billow; a large rolling swell of water.

"The fore part of the ship is most affected by the motion of a head sea and by the sound and shock of the surge."—Century Magazine, Dec. 1874, p. 604.

* 3. A swelling or rolling prominence.

* 4. The act or state of surging, or of heaving in an undulatory manner.

II. Naut.: The swell on a windlass-barrel upon which the cable or messenger surges or slips back.

surge, v.t. & i. [Lat. surgo = to rise.]

A. Intransitive:

* 1. Ord. Lang.: To swell; to rise high and roll, as waves.

"The surging air receives Its plamy burden." Thomson: Spring.

2. Naut.: To slip back: as, A cable surges.

B. Transitive:

Naut.: To let go a portion (of a rope) suddenly; to slack (a rope) up suddenly when it renders round a pin, a winch, windlass, or capstan.

* surge-fül, a. [Eng. surge, s.; -ful(ly).] Full of, or abounding with surges; rough.

Dryden: Poly-Oibion, s. 14.

* surge-lëss, *surge-lesse, a. [Eng. surge, s.; -less.] Free from surges; smooth, calm.

"In surgeless seas of quiet rest."
Mirror for Magistrates.

böl, böy; pout, jöwi; cat, çell, chorus, çin, bench; go, gem; thin, this; sin, as; expect, Xenophon, exist. ph = ç
-cian, -tian = çhan. -tion, -sion = çhün; -çlon, -çion = çhün. -çious, -çlous, -çious = çhüs. -ble, -dle, &c. = beç, deç.

surg-ent, a. [Lat. surgens, pr. par. of surgere = to rise.]

1. Ord. Lang.: Swelling.

Have ebbed their all, when the surgent seas
When their waves do rise again."
Greene: Alphonsus, l.

2. Geol.: Rising; a term applied to the fifth series of the Appalachian strata, synonymous with the Clinton group of New York, and, as shown by fossil echinoderms and trilobites, partially equivalent in age to the Silurian Wenlock formation of England. Maximum thickness about 2,400 feet. (Prof. H. D. Rogers: Geology of Pennsylvania.)

surg-eon, surg-i-en, surg-en, surg-cyn, surg-i-on, s. [A corrupt. of chirurgion (q. v.), from O. Fr. chirurgien, cerurgien.]

1. Ord. Lang.: One who practises surgery; in a more limited sense, one who cures diseases or injuries of the body by operating manually upon the patient. In a more general sense, one whose occupation is to treat diseases or injuries by medical appliances, whether internal or external.

¶ The London barbers and surgeons were incorporated in 1540 as one company, the barbers, however, being prohibited from attempting any surgical operations beyond the drawing of teeth. In 1745 the corporation was divided into two—the one of the barbers and the other of the surgeons. The same year what is now the Royal College of Surgeons of England obtained its first charter. Within the present century the art of the surgeon has made remarkable progress, and many operators of bold and striking skill have arisen, both in the United States and Europe. The discovery of antiseptic treatment has enabled surgeons to explore regions of the body which formerly they dared not touch, and operations are successfully performed to-day which in the past would have been deemed utterly impossible.

2. Ichthy.: A popular name for any species of the genus Acanthurus, from the sharp, erect, lancet-shaped spine with which each side of the tail is armed. In the early stages of their growth these fish are so different from the fully-developed individuals, that for some time the young fish were placed in a separate genus, Acronurus. (See extract.)

"Surgeons occur in all tropical seas, with the exception of the eastern part of the Pacific, where they disappear with the corals. They do not attain to any size, the largest species scarcely exceeding a length of eighteen inches. Many are agreeably or showily coloured, the ornamental colours being distributed in very extraordinary patterns. The larger species are eatable, and some even esteemed as food."—Günther: Study of Fishes, p. 439.

surgeon-apothecary, s. One who is both surgeon and apothecary.

surgeon-dentist, s. A dental-surgeon; a qualified dentist.

surgeon-fish, s. [SURGEON, s., 2.]

surg-eon-çy, s. [Eng. surgeon; -cy.] The office of a surgeon, as in the army or navy.

surg-eon-ry, s. [Eng. surgeon; -ry.] The practice of a surgeon; surgery; a surgery.

surg-er-ÿ, surg-er-ic, s. [A corrupt. of O. Fr. chirurgie, sururgie, chirurgie = surgery, from Low Lat. chirurgia; Gr. χειρουργία (cheirourgia) = a working with the hands; χείρ (cheir), genit. χειρός (cheiros) = the hand, and εργα (ergo) = to work.]

1. Science & Hist.: The term includes a science and an art, the former relating to the study of accidental injuries and surgical diseases common to the whole or several regions, organs, or textures of the body, and to morbid growths and pathological processes of particular organs or regions, the latter to their treatment by operation.

The Egyptians are said to have practised the art with success about 410 B.C. Hippocrates mentions a surgical instrument for reducing dislocated bones. Celsus, A.D. 17, was a skillful surgeon. In the third century surgery received an impulse from Erasistratus of Alexandria, who introduced the practice of dissecting the human subject. The Arabians made some progress in the art. The founder of modern surgery is considered to have been Andrew Vesalius (1514-1564). His great work, De Corporis Humani Fabrica Libri Septem, was published at Basel in 1543. The discoveries of Ambrose Paré, John Hunter, and others were followed by the conservative surgery in which so many signal triumphs were achieved. The employment of ether to produce insensibility by Dr. Morton, of Boston, in 1846, and of chloroform by Sir J. Simpson shortly afterwards, has been of the highest value to surgery. Ovariotomy, first performed by Dr. McDowell, of Kentucky, has saved hundreds of lives. Antiseptic treatment has been introduced by Sir Joseph Lister, with equally great effect; and Pasteur's inoculation treatment will, it is hoped, be carried to success, and produce the grandest results in preventing disease. The introduction of lithotomy, the cure of aneurism by pressure, the use of the ophthalmoscope, laryngoscope, and other instruments, with the radical cure for hernia, the operations for appendicitis and brain tumor, &c., may be mentioned as amongst the comparatively recent triumphs of modern surgery, rendering operations less terrifying and much more effectual.

"This would soon raise surgery into an art."—Warburton: Divine Legation, bk. iv., § 3.

2. A place where surgical operations are performed, or where medicines are prepared.

Surinam-toad, s.

Zool.: Pipa americana, a large flat toad, found on the edges of swamps in Surinam and the neighbouring country. It is about a foot long, with a short, broad, pointed head, the nostrils produced into a leathery tube; large hind limbs with webbed feet; fore feet small, with four slender webbed fingers, terminating in four small projections. It is brownish-olive above, whitish below; the skin is covered with a number of tiny hard granules, interspersed with horny, tubercular projections. It has no tongue, and the jaws and palate are toothless. The species is propagated in an extremely curious manner. When the eggs are laid, the male impregnates them, takes them in his paws, and places them on the back of the female, where they adhere by means of a glutinous secretion, and become by degrees embedded in a series of cells which then form in the skin. When the process is completed, a membrane closes over the cells, and the back of the female bears a strong resemblance to a piece of dark honeycomb. In these cells the eggs are hatched, and the young undergo their metamorphosis, bursting through the protecting membrane as perfect frogs.

"To treat for a surrender of the Palatinets." Bowell: Letters, bk. I., let. 10.

II. Technically:

1. Insurance: The abandonment of an assurance policy by the party assured on receiving back a portion of the premiums paid. The amount payable on the surrender of a policy is called the surrender value, and depends upon the number of years during which the premiums have been paid.

2. Law:

(1) The yielding up of an estate for life or for years to him that has the immediate estate in reversion or remainder. It may be either in fact or in law. A surrender in fact must be made by deed, which is the allowable evidence. A surrender in law is one which may be implied, and generally has reference to estates or tenancies from year to year, &c.

"A surrender, surremreddito, or rendering up, is of a nature directly opposite to a release: for as that operates by the greater estates descending upon the less, a surrender is the falling of a less estate into a greater. There may also be surrender in law by the acceptance by the tenant of a new estate inconsistent with his prior estate. Thus a new lease made to a person in possession under an old lease, and accepted by him, operates as a surrender in law of the old one; for from such acceptance the law implies his intention to yield up the estate which he had before, though he may not by express words of surrender have declared so much." Blackstone: Comment., bk. II., ch. 17.

(2) The appearance of a bankrupt in court for public examination.

"The next proceeding, in case an adjudication is made, is the surrender of the bankrupt, and his examination; the appointment of creditors' assignees, and the proof of debts against the estate." Blackstone: Comment., bk. II., ch. 27.

(3) The giving up of a principal into lawful custody by his bail.

(4) The delivery up of fugitives from justice by a foreign state; extradition.

¶ Surrender of copyholds:

- A. & B. As pr. par. & particip. adj.: (See the verb).
C. As subst.: The act or art of determining the boundaries, form, area, position, contour, &c., of any portion of the earth's surface, tract of country, coast, &c., by means of measurements taken on the spot; the art of determining the form, area, surface, contour, &c., of any portion of the earth's surface, and delineating it accurately on a map or plan.

1. Land surveying is the art of applying the principles of geometry and trigonometry to the measurement of land. The principal operations are laying down or driving base lines, and triangles on either side of the base. In large surveys it is desirable to lay down these triangles by measuring each angle with an instrument called the theodolite (q.v.), by which the accuracy of the measurement of the sides may be checked.

2. Geodesic surveying comprises all the operations of surveying carried on under the supposition that the earth is spheroidal. It embraces marine surveying (q.v.).

3. Marine or hydrographical surveying ascertains the forms of coast-lines, harbours, &c., and of objects on the shore, the entrances to harbours, channels, their depth, width, &c., the position of shoals, the depth of water thereon; and it embraces all the operations necessary to a complete determination of the contour of the bottom of a harbour or other sheet of water.

4. Military surveying: [RECONNAISSANCE].

5. Mining surveying may be either for the purpose of determining the situation and position of the shafts, galleries, and other underground excavations of a mine already in existence; or it may be for determining the proper positions for the shafts, galleries, &c., of a mine not yet opened.

6. Plane surveying: [PLANE-SURVEYING].

7. Railway surveying is a comprehensive term, embracing surveys intended to ascertain the best line of communication between two given points; it also includes all surveys for the construction of aqueducts for the supply of water to towns, &c.

8. Topographical surveying embraces all the operations incident to finding the contour of a portion of the earth's surface, and the various methods of representing it upon a plane surface. When only a general topographical map of a country is wanted, it is, in general, sufficient to survey the country with reference to its fields, roads, rivers, &c. Levels are run along the principal lines, as fences, roads, &c., and the highest of the most prominent points of the country are determined with respect to some plane of reference. Then the general outlines of the topography are sketched in by the eye; after the general outline is finished, the principal objects worthy of note are represented by a system of conventional signs.

sūr-vēy-ēr, *sūr-vēy-ēr, *sur-vel-er, s. [Eng. survey, v.; -or.]

*1. An overseer, a superintendent, an inspector.

"To make the fox surveyor of the fold," Shakeap.: 2 Henry IV., III. 1.

*sūr-view (few as ū), *sūr-vevo, v.t. [Prof. sur- (3), and Eng. view (q.v.).] To survey, to overlook.

"And lifted high above this earthly mass," Which it surveiwed, as hills do lower ground." Spenser: F. Q., II. ix. 45.

*sūr-view (few as ū), s. [SURVEY, v.] A survey, an inspection, an examination.

"After some surveying of the state of the body, he is able to inform them."—Sanderson: Sermons, p. 197.

sūr-vise, v.t. [Fr. sur = over, above, and viser = to look.] To look over, to supervise.

"It is the most vile, foolish, absurd, palpable, and ridiculous conceit that ever this eye surveiw'd."—Ben Jonson: Every Man Out of His Humour, III. 1.

sūr-viv-al, *sūr-viv-all, s. [Eng. survive(-); -al.]

1. Ord. Lang.: The act of surviving or outliving another or others; a living longer than others.

2. Anthrop.: A term introduced by Tylor to denote any process, custom, opinion, &c., which has been carried on by force of habit into a new state of society different from that in which it had its original home, thus remaining as a proof and an example of an older condition of culture out of which a newer has been evolved.

"Among evidence adding us to trace the course which the civilization of the world has actually followed. Is that great class of facts to denote which I have found it convenient to introduce the term 'survivals' . . . I know an old Somersetshire woman whose handloom dates from the time before the introduction of the flying-shuttle, which new-fangled appliance she has never even learnt to use, and I have seen her throw her shuttle from hand to hand in the classic fashion; this old woman is not a century behind her times, but she is a case of survival. Such examples often lead us back to the habits of hundreds and even thousands of years ago. The ordinal of the key and Bible, still in use, is a survival; the Midsummer bonfire is a survival; the Breton peasants' All Souls supper for the spirits of the dead is a survival."—Tylor: Prim. Cult. (ed. 1873), I. 16.

Biol.: A phrase introduced by Herbert Spencer to signify what Darwin called Natural Selection.

"The preservation during the battle for life of varieties which possess any advantage in structure, constitution, or instinct. I have called Natural Selection; and Mr. Herbert Spencer had well expressed the same idea by the Survival of the Fittest."—Darwin: Variation of Animals & Plants, I. 6.

*sūr-viv-ānce, *sūr-viv-ān-ĉy, s. [Eng. survive(-); -ance, -ancy.] Survival, survivorship.

"It mentioneth the survivaunce but of one of them."—Buck: Hist. Richard III.

sūr-vive', v.t. & i. [Fr. survive, from Lat. supervivo, from super = above, beyond, and vivo = to live.]

A. Transitive: 1. To live longer than; to outlive; to live beyond the life of.

"Christ's soul survived the death of his body; therefore shall the soul of every believer survive the body's death."—Bishop Hovley: Sermons, vol. I., ser. 20.

2. To outlive; to last longer than; to live after.

"His art survived the waters." Cowper: Task, v. 230.

B. Intrans. : To remain alive; to live after the death of another or others, or after some event has happened.

"Look if your hapless father yet survive." Dryden: Virgil; Æneid II. 512.

*sūr-viv-ēn-ĉy, s. [Eng. survive(-); -ency.] Survival.

sūr-viv-ēr, s. [Eng. survive(-); -er.] One who survives or outlives; a survivor.

sūr-viv-ing, pr. par. & a. [SURVIVE.]

A. As pr. par. : (See the verb).

B. As adj. : Remaining alive; yet living or existing.

sūr-viv-ēr, s. [Eog. survivo(-); -or.]

1. Ord. Lang.: One who lives after the death of another or others, or after some event or time.

"Men, dogs, and horses, all are dead; He is the sole survivor." Wordsworth: Simon Lee.

2. Law: The longer liver of two joint tenants, or of any two persons who have a joint interest in anything.

sūr-viv-ēr-ship, s. [Eng. survivor; -ship.]

1. Ord. Lang.: The state of surviving or outliving another or others, or of living after some event has taken place.

"But as to any interesting speculations concerning its state of survivorship, 'tis plain they had none."—Warburton: Divine Legation, bk. v., § 6.

2. Law: The right of a joint tenant or other person who has a joint interest in an estate to take the whole estate upon the death of the other.

"From the same principle also arises the remaining grand incident of joint-estates; viz. the doctrine of survivorship: by which two or more persons are seized of a joint estate, of inheritance, for their own lives, or pur autre vie, or are jointly possessed of any chattel interest, the entire tenancy upon the decease of any of them remains to the survivors, and at length to the last survivor; and he shall be entitled to the whole estate, whatever it be, whether an inheritance or a common frehold only, or even a lease estate."—Blackstone: Comment, bk. II., ch. 12.

¶ Chance of survivorship: The chance that a person of one age has of surviving another of a different age. Thus, according to the Carlisle Tables of Mortality, the chances of survivorship for two persons aged twenty-five and sixty-five respectively are eighty-nine and eleven, in other words, the chances are eight to one that the younger will survive the older.

sūs, s. [Lat. Gr. ῥῆς (hus); O. H. Ger. sū = a pig, a swine.]

1. Zool.: The typical genus of the family Suidæ, or the sub-family Suidæ (q.v.), with fourteen species ranging over the Palearctic and Oriental regions, and into the first Australian sub-region as far as New Guinea; absent from the Ethiopian region, or barely entering it on the north-east. The lower incisors are inclined forward, canines of the males tusk-like; the molars have broad crowns, with two transverse ridges (three or more in the last molar) divided into rounded tubercles. There are four toes to all the feet; the third and fourth digits form a functional pair, while the second and fifth are rudimentary, and do not touch the ground.

2. Paleont.: The genus appears to have commenced in the Miocene Tertiary. Sus scrofa (the Wild Boar) is first found in the Post-Pliocene.

sū-sān-nīto, s. [After the Susanna mine, Leadhills, Scotland, where first found; suff. -ite (Min.); Ger. susannit.]

date; for Propertius (El., III. xiii. 15-20) graphically describes it, and thus contrasts the behaviour of Indian with that of Roman wives—

"Ardent victrices, et flamma pectora præbent, Impunctis ut aiis ora perusta viris.
Hic genus iulicis nuptiarum; hic nulla puella, Nec fida Evadne, nec pia Penelope."

2. A widow burnt on the funeral pile of her dead husband. [1.]

"In Brahmanic India the widow of a Hindu of the Brahman or the Kshetriya caste was burnt on the funeral pile with her husband, as a sati, or 'good woman,' which word has passed into English as suttee."—Tylor: Prim. Cult. (ed. 1878), I. 465.

suttee-burning, s.

Anthrop.: Sutteeism (q.v.).

"While admitting, with Prof. Müller, that the more modern ordinance of suttee-burning is a corrupt departure from the early Brahmanic ritual, we may nevertheless find some reason to consider the practice as not a new invention by the later Hindu priesthood, but as the revival, under congenial influences, of an ancient Aryan rite, belonging originally to a period even earlier than the Veda."—Tylor: Prim. Cult. (ed. 1878), I. 465.

süt-tec'-ism, s. [Eng. suttee; -ism.]

Anthrop.: The rite or practice of suttee (q.v.).

"The chief characteristic of sutteeism is its exploratory quality; for, by this act of faith, the süt not only makes atonement for the sins of her husband, and secures the remission of her own, but has the joyful assurance of reunion to the object whose bestitude she secures."—Balfour: Cyclop. India (ed. 3rd), III. 752.

süt-tle, v.t. [SCOTL.] To follow the occupation of a sutler.

II. Technically:
 1. Naut.: The groove around a tackle-block for the strap. Also called the Score.
 2. Ornith.: Hirundo rustica, a well-known European bird, whose arrival from Africa (usually about the middle of April) is eagerly looked for as a sign of approaching summer. In the northern United States the coming of the Purple Swallow, or Purple Martin (H. or Progne purpurea), is similarly hailed with general pleasure as the harbinger of spring. It abounds in the United States, often frequenting the streets of towns, and frequently nesting in boxes placed for its near country houses. In color it is a shining purplish blue, with black wings and tail. H. erythrogastris, the Rufous-bellied Swallow, also readily nests in such boxes, making a nest of mud and fine hay. The Republican or Cliff Swallow (Petrochelidon lunifrons) makes a mud nest, of flask shape, which it attaches to a rock or house wall. There are in all about 60 species of Swallow, everywhere found. The food of H. rustica consists entirely of winged insects; on their arrival, these birds feed exclusively on gnats and crane-flies, in summer small beetles are very largely taken. These are captured as the birds fly with open mouth, the birdies with which the gape is supplied and the viscid saliva assisting to retain the prey. Like owls, Swallows reject the undigested portions of their food in small pellets or castings. The male is about eight inches long; back black, forehead, chin, and throat chestnut; head, neck, back, rump, and upper tail-coverts steel-blue; tail very much forked; under surface buffy-white, legs and toes slender and black, claws black and sharp. In the female the tail-feathers are not so long, nor are they developed in the young birds till they have left for the south. The note of the bird just described, known in England as the Chimney Swallow, is a low musical twitter.

swān, s. [A.S. swan; cogn. with Dut. swaan; Icel. swanr; Dan. svane; Sw. swan; Ger. schwan; O. H. Ger. swan, swana.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Lit.: In the same sense as II. 2

2. Fig.: Applied to a famous poet: thus, Shakespeare is called the Swan of Avon, Virgil the Swan of Mantua.

II. Technically:

1. Astron.: The constellation Cygnus.

2. Ornith.: Any individual of the genus Cygnus (q.v.). The Swans form a sharply defined group; the body is elongated, the neck very long, head moderate; beak about as long as head; legs short, and placed far back. On the under-surface the plumage is thick and fur-like; on the upper side the feathers are broad, but both above and below the body is thickly covered with down. Their short legs render their movements on land awkward and ungainly, but in the water these birds are graceful to a proverb. Their food consists of vegetable substances and weeds, their long necks enabling them to dip below the surface and to reach their food at considerable depths. Swans breed in high latitudes, but the domesticated species, Cygnus olor, the Mute Swan, breeds on eyots and the shores of lakes, making a very large nest on land, in which five or six greenish eggs are deposited. The young generally are covered with a gray down till the age of two years, when they assume the characteristic white plumage of the older birds. The American Swan (C. americanus) has its breeding places in northern Canada, its winter excursions extending no further southward than North Carolina. Another American species, the Trumpeter Swan (C. buccinator) breeds chiefly in Arctic regions, but migrates farther south, large flocks being seen in winter as far south as Texas. Europe possesses, in addition to C. olor, the Whistling Swan (C. musicus), Bewick's Swan (C. bewicki), and the Polish Swan (C. cygnus). The most beautiful of the whole genus is the Black-necked Swan (C. nigricollis), from South America; while the most remarkable is the Black Swan (C. atratus), from Australia, first brought to Europe early in the seventeenth century. So convinced were the ancients that white plumage was of the essence of a swan, that a "black swan" was a proverbial expression for something extremely rare—if not for the non-existent—from the days of Juvenal (vi. 161-4) to those of Sir Thomas Browne (Pulg. Err., bk. v., ch. xix.). The stories about the musical voice of the Swan, though greatly embellished by early writers, appear to have some foundation in fact so far as regards the Whooper (C. musicus). T. Rymer Jones says, "The dying Swan, we find, has nothing peculiar in its notes, but its last cries may be as loud and scribed it in 1552, called it Ephemera pestilens, or One-day pestilence. It was introduced into England by the irregular troops of the Earl of Richmond in 1485, when he came over to assert his claim to the throne against Richard III. The battle of Bosworth was fought on Aug. 22, 1485, and immediately after the disease appeared in the army, and in London on the arrival of the victors four days later. It was a violent special type of miasmatic fever. It lasted five weeks, and passed away as suddenly as it came. Later epidemics of the same disease occurred in 1506, 1517, 1528, and 1550, after which it never appeared again. On the last occasion it originated in the army of Edward VI., in France, and was brought by the affected soldiers to England: two sons of Charles Brandon, both Dukes of Suffolk and nephews of Henry VIII., died of it, and a vast number of men of inferior rank.

A. As adj.: Of or belonging to Swedenborg.

B. As subst.: A follower of Emanuel Swedenborg, son of Jesper Swedenborg, bishop of Skara, in West Gothland. The son was born at Stockholm on Jan. 29, 1688. He thought much of religion in very early life, and diligently studied physics, mathematics, and classics at the University of Upsal, afterwards visiting Oxford, Paris, &c. Before leaving the University, he had been appointed by Charles XII. assessor in the Royal Metallic College of Sweden, and, in 1719, was ennobled by Charles's successor, Queen Ulrica Eleonora, under the name of Swedenborg, by which he is generally known. Between early manhood and his fifty-eighth year, he actively prosecuted his studies in mathematics, physics, &c., publishing various works, as the Opera Philosophica et Mineralia (in 1733), in three volumes, and the Philosophy of the Infinite (in 1734). In April, 1745, being at an inn in London, Swedenborg considered that he had a vision of the Lord, who called him to a holy office, opened his sight to the spiritual world, and endowed him with the gift of conversing with spirits and angels. In August he returned to Stockholm, commenced the study of the Hebrew scriptures, resigned his assessorship in 1747, and spent the remainder of his life in forming and propagating his theological views. He died in London in his eighty-fifth year, March 29, 1772, in Great Bath Street, Coldbath Fields, and was buried in the Swedish Church in Ratcliff Highway. His system is presented at length in his various works, especially his Arcana Cælestia (8 vols., London, 1749-1756). He believed that he was several times allowed to enter heaven, "which was arranged in streets and squares like earthly cities, but with fields and gardens interposed." There was a magnificent palace with a temple in the midst, with a table in it, and on the table the Word of God, with two angels by its side. The form of angels was altogether like that of men. Matter and spirit are connected by an eternal law. He accepted only twenty-nine of the Old Testament books, rejecting Ruth, 1 and 2 Chronicles, Ezra, Nehemiah, Esther, Job, Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, and the Song of Solomon. Of the New Testament he accepted only the Gospels and the Apocalypse. He held that there is a double sense in scripture, the most important being the spiritual. He believed in one God and in the Trinity, and that the Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ was that God; that Jehovah himself became incarnate as the Word. Heaven and hell are not places, but states, and the Devil is not a person, but a name of hell. The judgment on the first Christian church took effect in 1757, and was seen by Swedenborg in the spiritual world, after which, and in lieu of it, the New Church, called in Revelation (xli., xlii.), New Jerusalem, descended from heaven. Swedenborg himself founded no church. His followers publicly associated themselves as a congregation in Eastcheap in 1788. In 1810 a Swedenborgian Society was established, and a Missionary and Tract Society in 1821. Congregations exist in England, the United States, on the continent of Europe, &c.

The fruit is a prickly capsule, husk, or involucre, with one or more nuts, each with one large seed. It grows wild in the south of Europe. On the slopes of Etna, where there are forests of it, there grow some old trees with trunks of enormous girth. In Britain it occurs only in plantations. The chestnuts of commerce are derived chiefly from the cultivated varieties of the tree, and are larger and sweeter than the wild fruit. The nuts are consumed as an article of daily food in the south of Europe, and in parts of France are served up for breakfast, boiled in milk. Many houses in the older parts of London are said by Evelyn to have been built of its timber, which has the character of keeping off insects, spiders, &c. It is good for mill and water works, besides affording excellent stakes for palisades, and props for vines and hops. Called also the Spanish Chestnut.

4. The swimming-bladder of fishes.

"The braces have the nature and use of tendons, in contracting the swim."—Grew.

¶ In the swim: In the secret; knowing all the circumstances of an enterprise, &c. Also, in society; in prosperity. (Slang.)

Comp. Anat.: The same as SWIMMING-BLADDER (q.v.).

swim-mër-ët, s. [Eng. swimmer; dimin. suff. -et.]

Comp. Anat. (Pl.): The limbs on the abdominal segments of the Crustacea, so modified as to serve for swimming organs. In the Lobster, in which they may be seen to advantage, there are five pairs, the last pair being greatly expanded, and forming, with the telson, a powerful caudal fin. Each swimmer consists of a basal joint, to which are attached two diverging joints, the inner of which is called the endopodite and the outer the exopodite. In the female, the fine hairs fringing the swimmers serve as supports for the eggs or "berries" during the spawning season.

swim-mîng (1), pr. par., a., & s. [SWIM (1), v.]

A. & B. As pr. par. & particip. adj.:

1. Ord. Lang.: (See the verb).

2. Bot.: Floating under water, as Conservæ.

C. As subst.: The act or art of sustaining and propelling the body in water.

¶ The human body, when the lungs are inflated, is slightly lighter than an equal volume of fresh water, and consequently floats on the surface. It does so yet more easily on salt water, which is heavier than fresh. But, in floating, the head tends to sink. The art of swimming in man is the art of keeping the head above water and the lungs as much as possible inflated. To raise the head above water, the rest of the body must as much as possible be kept below it; and when a person unable to swim, falling into deep water, instinctively raises his arms above the surface, his head simultaneously sinks. Movement forward in swimming is produced by the flexion and abduction of the arms and by the extension and adduction of the legs. Quadrupeds swim easily, their head being so placed as to remain naturally above water.

swimming-bath, s. A bath large enough for persons to swim in.

swimming-bell, s.

Zool.: The same as NECTOCALYX (q.v.).

swimming-belt, s. An air-inflated belt worn round the person as a support in the water.

swimming-birds, s. pl.

Ornith.: The same as NATORES (q.v.).

swimming-bladder, s.

Comp. Anat.: The swim-bladder or air-bladder of Fishes; a hollow sac, formed of several tunics, containing gas, situated in the abdominal cavity, but outside the peritoneal sac, entirely closed or communicating by a duct with the intestinal tract. The special function of the swimming-bladder is to alter the specific gravity of the fish, or to change the centre of gravity. It is absent in the Lepidostei, Cyclostomata, Chondropterygii, and Holocephala, but occurs in all the Ganoidi, in one sub-order of which (Dipnoi) it possesses anatomical characters, and assumes, to some extent, the functions of a lung; in the genus Ceratodus, the swimming-bladder, though a single cavity, has symmetrically arranged internal pouches, while in the other genera of the sub-order (Lepidostei and Protopterygii) it is laterally halved, is supplied with venous blood by a true pulmonary artery, and by its cellular structure closely approaches the lungs of a reptile.

swimming-crab, s.

Zool. (Pl.): Crabs having their hind pair of feet specially modified for swimming, spec. the genus Portunus (q.v.).

swimming-herb, s.

Bot.: Lemna minor. (Britten & Holland.)

A. Intransitive:

*1. To sweep along or by.

"Proud Tamer swoops along with such a lusty train, As fits so brave a flood." —Drayton: Poly-Olbon, s. 1.

2. To descend upon prey suddenly from a height, as a hawk; to stoop.

B. Transitive:

1. To fall on suddenly and seize; to catch up; to take with a sweep.

"This mould'ring piece in your hands did fall, And now at last you came to sweep it all." —Drayton: Conquest of Granada, l. 1.

2. To dash upon while on the wing; to seize, as a bird of prey: as, A hawk swoops a chicken.

swööp, s. [SWOOP, v.] The sudden pouncing of a bird of prey on its quarry; a sudden seizing, as of a quarry by a bird of prey.

swööp-stäke, s. [SWEEPSTAKE.]

swöp, v.t. & f. [SWAP, v.]

A. Trans.: To exchange, to barter, to swap.

"I would have swopp'd Youth for old age, and all my life behind, To have been then a momentary man." —Drayton: Cleomenes.

B. Intrans.: To make an exchange; to barter.

swörd, (w silent), *suerd, *swarder, *sward, *swarda, s. [A.S. suerd; cogn. with Dut. zwaard; Icel. sverð; Dan. sværd; Sw. svärd; M. H. Ger. swerte; Ger. schwert. From the same root as Sansc. svri = to hunt, to kill.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Lit.: An offensive weapon having a blade, either straight or curved, with a tang, which is inserted into a spindle-shaped piece of wood, covered with leather, and wrapped around with brass wire; these form the gripe, which, with the brass knob at the end, called the pommel, constitutes the hilt. The hand is protected by the guard, which is a curved

SWORDS.

1, 2. Cutting weapons of Stone Age; 3. Ancient Greek Sword; 4. Roman; 5. Saxon; 6. Danish; 7. Medieval cutting and thrusting sword; 8. sword of sixteenth century; 9. sword of the eighteenth century; 10. nineteenth century sword.

piece of metal, consisting of from one to three branches, and usually provided with a broad plate of metal, the guard-plate, at the point where it is attached to the blade. The blade of a sword consists of: the tang, which enters the hilt; the shoulder, which abuts against the end of the hilt; the forte, the half of the blade nearest the hilt; the foible, or foible, the half nearest the point; the point, the back, the flat, the edge. The parts of the hilt vary in different kinds of swords; the principal are: the pommel, or back piece; the gripe; the bars of the basket, in sabres; the stool or guard-plate; the bow, in sergeants' swords and horse-artillery sabres; the cross, as in the old Highland claymore; the linguets, in foils and rapiers. The blade, usually of polished steel, may be straight and pointed for thrusting, as in the rapier; with a sharp point and one or two cutting edges for thrusting and striking, as in the broadsword; or curved and with a sharp convex edge for striking, as in the Eastern scimitar. Swords are worn suspended from the waist by a sword-belt, and inclosed in a sheath called a scabbard. The sword of modern days has been developed by successive improvements from the rude cutting weapons of the men of the Stone Age, as shown in the illustration.

2. Figuratively:

(1) Used as an emblem or symbol:

(a) Of power or authority.

"The sword, the mace, the crown." —Shakespeare: Henry V., iv. 1.

(b) Of justice, or judicial vengeance or punishment.

(2) The military profession; the profession of arms; arms generally.

(3) Destruction in battle or by the sword; war, dissension.

"The sword without, and terror within." —Deut. xxvii. 15.

(4) The cause of death or destruction; ruin, death.

"Avarice hath been the sword of our slain kings." —Shakespeare: Macbeth, iv. 2.

II. Technically:

1. Weav.: One of the bars dependent from the rocking-tree and supporting the lay.

2. Flax.: The scutching-blade of the flax-dresser.

¶ (1) Sword of State: The sword which is borne before the sovereign, lords, and governors of counties, cities, or boroughs, &c. Four swords are used at the coronation of a British sovereign: (1) The sword of state properly so called; (2) the sword of mercy, which is pointless; (3) the sword of spiritual justice, and (4) the sword of temporal justice.

(2) To put to the sword: To kill.

sword-fight, s. A combat with swords; fencing.

1. Astron.: Dorado (q.v.).

2. Ichthy.: A popular name for any individual of the Xiphiidae (q.v.). They are pelagic fishes, widely distributed in tropical and sub-tropical seas, extremely strong and swift, so that the larger species are rarely captured, and more rarely preserved for examination and study. Their popular name is derived from their formidable sword-like weapon, formed by the coalescence and prolongation of the maxillary and intermaxillary bones beyond the lower jaw; it is very hard and strong, and capable of inflicting terrible wounds. All the species undergo considerable change; young specimens differing widely from the adult in the general shape of the body, and in the production of the lower as well as of the upper jaw. Sword-fishes seem to have a mortal antipathy to whales and other large Cetacea, attacking them whenever occasion offers, and so far as is known, always coming off victorious. In their fury sword-fishes often attack boats and vessels, evidently mistaking them for Cetaceans; and sometimes the sword has been driven through the bottom of a ship, and broken off by the fish in vain struggles to withdraw it. A piece of two-inch plank of a whale-boat, in which the broken sword still remains, may be seen in the Natural History Museum, South Kensington. Sword-fishes are the largest of the Acanthopterygii; specimens of the genus Histiogobius [SAILOR-FISH, XIPHIDAE], from the Indian and Pacific Oceans, reaching a length of from twelve to fifteen feet, of which the sword occupies rather more than three. The Common or Mediterranean Sword-fish sometimes reaches a length of ten feet, with a proportionately shorter sword; it is bluish-black above, merging into silver below. The tunny-fishers often take these fish in their nets, and their flesh, especially when young, is said to be equal in flavour to that of the tunny (q.v.).

tree, forty to sixty feet high, with spreading branches; large, five-lobed, coarsely and unequally serrate leaves, glaucous and downy on the veins beneath; pendulous racemes of greenish flowers, and glabrous fruit furnished with two long, membranous wings. It flowers in May and June. The wood is used for bowls, trenchers, and other turnery. The sap is sacchariferous. It grows wild in Switzerland, Germany, Austria, Italy, and western Asia. It is a hardy tree, flourishing in spits of high winds or sea-spray. When the leaves first appear they are covered with a clammy juice containing sugar, attractive to insects, by which they are perforated and disfigured.

(3) The Platanus or Plane tree, Platanus occidentalis, is popularly known in the United States as the Sycamore or Buttonwood tree. It is the largest, though not the loftiest, of American forest trees. Along the western rivers specimens of 40 to 50 feet girth, or more than 13 feet diameter, are found. The bark is yearly detached in large scales, showing a white surface beneath.

"He makes it his first business to tamper with his reader by sycophanting and mismanaging the work of his adversary."—Milton: Apology for Smectymnus.

* syç-ô-phânt-çy, s. [SYCOPHANCY.]

syç-ô-phân'-tic, a. [Gr. συκοφαντικός (sukophantikos)] Pertaining to or characteristic of a sycophant; servilely flattering or fawning; parasitic.

"They made themselves sycophantic servants to the King of Spain."—De Quincey: Spanish Nun, l. 14.

* sycophantic-plants, s. pl.

Bot.: Parasitic plants.

* syç-ô-phân'-tic-al, a. [Eng. sycophantic; -al.] Sycophantic.

syç-ô-phânt'-ish, a. [Eng. sycophant, s.; -ish.] Like a sycophant; sycophantic, parasitic.

* syç-ô-phânt'-ish-ly, adv. [Eng. sycophantish; -ly.] Like a sycophant.

"Neither proud, nor sycophantically and falsely humble."—De Quincey: Spanish Nun, l. 24.

* syç-ô-phânt'-ism, s. [Eng. sycophant, s.; -ism.] The practices or manners of a sycophant; sycophancy.

"Servile sycophantism and artful bigotry."—Knox: Spirit of Despotism, l. 9.

* syç-ô-phânt'-ize, v. t. [Eng. sycophant; -ize.] To play the sycophant.

"To sycophantize is to play the sycophant, or slander, or accuse falsely, to deal deceitfully."—Glossol. Synographia.

* syç-ô-phânt'-ry, s. [Eng. sycophant; -ry.] Mean or officious tale-bearing or adulation; sycophancy.

"The attempts of envy, of treachery, of flattery, of sycophantry, of avarice, to which his condition is obnoxious."—Barrow: Sermons, vol. iii, ser. 41.

syç-ô-rêt'-in, s. [Gr. σύκων (sukon), and πηρίτην (phēritēn) = resin.]

Chem.: An amorphous, white, neutral resin, obtained from the resin of Ficus rubiginosa by treatment with cold alcohol. It is very brittle and highly electric; is soluble in alcohol, ether, chloroform, and oil of turpentine, and melts in boiling water to a thick liquid, which floats on the surface.

syç-ô-sis, a. [Gr. σύκωσις (sukōsis), from σύκων (sukon) = a fig.]

Pathol.: Ringworm of the beard, produced by a fungal, Microsporon mentagrophytes, and aggravated by the use of alcoholic drinks. It most frequently affects the chin, sometimes spreading to other parts of the face; it is seldom seen on the scalp, and rarely affects women. Attention to cleanliness, the improvement of the general health, and especially the destruction of the parasite by sulphurous acid or by carbolic acid, are the proper remedies. Called also Tinea sycosis and Mentagra. [MICROSPORON.]

syde, a. [SIDÆ, a.] Long. (Prov.)

"Ye dinns carry yer coats over syde."—G. Macdonald: Robert Falconer, l. 112.

sy-dër'-ô-lite, s. [SIDEROLITE.] A kind of earthenware made in Bohemia, and resembling Wedgwood ware.

sy-en-ite, si'-en-ite, s. [After Syene, Egypt, where first found; suff. -ite (Petrol).]

Petrol.: A name originally applied to the granite of Syene, which contains hornblende, but now generally restricted to a rock which consists of orthoclase, feldspar, and hornblende only; or, where quartz is present, only in sufficient quantity to be regarded as an accessory, and not as an essential constituent. By the increase in the amount of quartz, and the presence of mica, syenite graduates into a hornblende granite. Petrologists recognize, as a typical syenite, the rock of Meissen, near Dresden.

syenite-porphyr, s.

Petrol.: A term sometimes used to designate a syenite in which some of the orthoclase is present in large individual crystals, but more frequently applied to a porphyry (felsite) which contains hornblende.

sy-en-it'-ic, a. [Eng. syenit(e); -ic.]

Petrol.: Partaking of the composition of a syenite. Only applied to certain crystalline rocks which contain hornblende: as, syenitic-granite, syenitic-gneiss.

syç-poor'-ite, s. [After Syepoor, India, where found; suff. -ite (Min.).]

Min.: A name given to a granular or minutely crystalline mineral employed by Indian jewellers to give a rose colour to gold. Stated to have the composition: sulphur, 35.2; cobalt, 64.8 = IO_3 , which would yield the simple formula, CoS . Samples, however, of this mineral from the original locality appear to be cobaltine (q.v.), so that the species is at present a doubtful one.

sy-hë'-drite, s. [After the Syhadree (mis-spelt Syhedree) Mountains, Bombay, where found; suff. -ite (Min.).]

Min.: A green mineral substance found in cavities in a porphyritic amygdaloidal dolerlate, rât, fâre, amidst, whât, fâll, father; wê, wêt, hère, camêl, hër, thère; pine, pît, sîre, sir, marine; gô, pôé, er, wôre, wôlf, wôrk, whô, sôn; mûte, cûb, cûre, ûnîte, cûr, rûle, fûll; try, Sýrian. æ, œ = ô; ey = â; qu = kw.

ite, of uncertain composition, but supposed to be related to stilbite (q.v.). Named by Shepard.

syke, silke, s. [Icel. sik = a ditch, a trench.] A small rill, commonly running out of a quartzite; a small rill without sand or gravel. (Swedish.)

* See I took up the syke a wee bit away to the right. -Scott: Old Mortality, ch. xxiii.

* syke, a. [Sick.]

* syke, v.t. [A.S. sican.] To sigh.

syll-, pref. [The form taken by the Greek pref. sun (sun) = with, before words beginning with the letter l.] (See etym.)

sylla, s. [Icel. sil, sili = fish of the herring kind.] The young of the herring. (Prov.)

syll-la-bar-i-um (pl. syll-la-bar-i-a), s. [Low Lat., from Lat. syllaba = a syllable (q.v.).] A catalogue of the primitive syllables of a language.

syll-la-bar-ium, s. [Low Lat. syllabarium.] The same as SYLLABARIUM (q.v.).

* Consequently the monuments present us with several different forms of the euniform syllabary. -Athenaeum, Aug. 19, 1864.

* syll-labe, s. [O. Fr., from Lat. syllaba = a syllable (q.v.).] A syllable.

* A syllabe is a part of a word that may itself make a part of a sound. -Ben Jonson: English Grammar, ch. vi.

syll-lab-ic, * syll-lab-ic-al, a. [Gr. συλλαβικός (syllabikos), from συλλαβή (syllabe) = syllable (q.v.); Fr. syllabique.]

1. Pertaining to a syllable or syllables.

* In the responses also, which are noted for various voices, this syllabic distinction is sufficiently attended to. -Mason: Church Music, p. 98.

2. Consisting of a syllable or syllables; as, syllabic accent.

syllabic-tune, s. A tune in which one note is allotted to one syllable of the words, and hence containing no slurs, as The Old Hundredth.

syll-lab-ic-al-ly, adv. [Eng. syllabical; -ly.] In a syllabic manner; in syllables.

* Uttered . . . as children are wont not so plaudly, and syllabically, and distinctly, as could have been wished. -Hammond: Sermons, Vol. IV., sec. 14.

* syll-lab-ic-ate, v.t. [Eng. syllabe = a syllable; suff. -ic-ate.] To form into syllables.

* syll-lab-ic-ation, s. [SYLLABICATE.] The act of forming syllables; the act or method of dividing words into syllables.

* A division of the generality of words, as they are actually pronounced, gives us the general law of syllabication. -Walker: English Dictionary. (Adv.)

* syll-lab-ic-ify, v.t. [Eng. syllabify; -cation.] The same as SYLLABICATION (q.v.).

* The unaccented parts have lost their distinct syllabication. -Baird: Philology, § 632.

* syll-lab-ic-ify, v.t. [Eng. syllabe = a syllable; -ify.] To form into syllables.

* syll-lab-ist, s. [Eng. * syllabe = a syllable; -ist.] One versed in dividing words into syllables.

* syll-la-bize, v.t. [Mid. Eng. syllab(e) = syllable; Eng. suff. -ize.] To articulate; to divide into syllables.

* Language frame and syllabize the tone. -Howell: Parly of Beasts. (Pref.)

syll-la-ble, * sill-la-ble, s. [O. Fr. sillabe, syllabe, syllable, from Lat. syllaba; Gr. συλλαβή (syllabe) = that which holds together. . . . a syllable: συ (sun), for συν (sun) = with, and λαμβάνω (lambano) = to take, to seize; Sp. silaba; Port. & Ital. sillaba.]

1. A sound, or a combination of sounds uttered together, or at a single effort or impulse of the voice, and constituting a word or part of a word. A syllable may consist of a single vowel, as a in alas, e in ever, &c.; or of a vowel and a consonant, as in go, do, lo, at, &c.; or of a combination of consonants with a vowel or diphthong, as strong, out, arm, strands, &c. In English the consonants l and n sometimes form syllables, as in able, fable, prison, reckon, &c., where the final syllables are really l and n. A word is named according to the number of syllables contained in it; thus, a word of one syllable is a monosyllable; of two, a dissyllable; of many syllables, a polysyllable.

2. In printing and writing, a section or part of a word divided from the rest, and capable of being pronounced at one impulse of the voice. It may, or may not, correspond with the syllable of the spoken language.

3. The least expression or particle of language or thought; as, There is not a syllable of truth in the statement.

* syll-la-ble, v.t. [SYLLABLE, s.] To utter; to articulate.

* Airy tongues that syllable men's names. On sands and shores, and desert wilderness. Milton: Comus, 304.

syll-la-būb, s. [SILLABUS.]

syll-la-būs, s. [Lat.] [SYLLABLE, s.] A compendium of the heads of a discourse, of a course of lectures, or the like; an abstract, a table of contents, &c.

The Syllabus: Church Hist.: A list, embracing the "chief errors and false doctrines of our most unhappy age," compiled by order of Pope Pius IX., and sent, with an encyclical letter, dated Dec. 8, 1864, "to all the bishops of the Catholic world, in order that these bishops may have before their eyes all the errors and pernicious doctrines which he had reprobated and condemned," the number of which amounts to eighty, probably in imitation of the eighty heresies mentioned by Epiphanius as existing in the first three centuries. The syllabus is divided into ten sections, and attacks Rationalism, Pantheism, Latitudinarianism, Socialism, errors concerning the Church, Society, Natural and Christian Ethics, Marriage, the Power of the Pope, and modern Liberalism.

syll-lēp'-sis, s. [Gr. = a taking together, from the same root as syllable (q.v.).]

Rhetoric & Grammar:

1. A figure of speech by which we conceive the sense of words otherwise than the words import, and construe them according to the intention of the author; the taking of words in two senses at once, the literal and the metaphorical (as sweeter in the extract).

* The judgments of the Lord are true and righteous altogether. . . sweeter also than honey and the honeycomb. -Psalm xix. 9, 10.

2. A figure by which one word is referred to another in the sentence to which it does not grammatically belong, as the agreement of a verb or adjective with one rather than another of two nouns, with either of which it might agree; as, rex et regina beati.

syll-lēp'-tic, syll-lēp'-tic-al, a. [SYLLEPTIC.] Pertaining or relating to, or implying syllepsis.

syll-lēp'-tic-al-ly, adv. [Eng. sylleptical; -ly.] In a sylleptical manner; by way of syllepsis.

syll-li-dæ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. syll(is); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -idæ.]

Zool.: A family of Errant Annelids, in some classifications separated from the Nereidæ (q.v.). Genera: Syllis, Grubea, Dujardinia, and Schmaridia.

syll-lis, s. [Gr. ψέλλιον (psellion) = a neck-lace. (McNicoll).]

Zool.: The type-genus of Syllidæ (q.v.). Head bilobed, with four transverse eyes and three thin, moniliform tentacles; body elongate, slender, with numerous segments; proboscis without jaws.

syll-lō-gism, * sill-o-gism, s. [O. Fr. silogisme, syllogisme, syllogisme, from Lat. syllogismum, accus. of syllogismus; Gr. συλλογισμός (sullogismos) = a reckoning together or up, reasoning, syllogism, from συλλογίζομαι (sullogizomai) = to reckon together, to reason: συ (sul), for συν (sun) = with, together, and λογίζομαι (logizomai) = to reckon; λόγος (logos) = a word, reason, reckoning; Fr. syllogisme.]

Logic:

1. An argument expressed in strict logical form, so that its conclusiveness is manifest from the structure of the expression alone, without any regard to the meaning of the terms. (Whately.) In a perfect syllogism there must be three, and not more than three propositions, the last of which, containing the matter to be proved, is called the conclusion; the other two, containing the means by which the conclusion is arrived at, are called the premises. The subject of the conclusion is called the minor term, and its predicate the major term; the third term, with which the minor and major terms are compared in the premises, is called the middle term. The premise which brings into relation the major and the middle terms is called the major premise, and that which brings the minor and middle terms into a similar relation is called the minor premise. Thus, in the syllogism:

Major Premise. All A is B. Minor Premise. All C is A. Conclusion. ∴ All C is B.

B is the major, C the minor, and A the middle term, Substituting words for symbols, Major Premise. All ruminants are quadrupeds. Minor Premise. All deer are ruminants. Conclusion. ∴ All deer are quadrupeds.

This syllogism is valid, because the conclusion logically follows from the premises. The conclusion is, moreover, true, because the premises from which it logically follows are true.

The figure of a syllogism consists in the situation of the middle term with respect to the major and minor. In the first figure the middle is the subject of the major and the predicate of the minor; in the second it is the predicate, and in the third the subject of both premises; and the fourth figure is the reverse of the first, the middle term being the predicate of the major and the subject of the minor. The symbolic names of these figures are commemorated in the following mnemonic hexameters:

1. BARBARA, CEIAREnt, DARII, FERIOque prioris. 2. CESARE, CAMESTRE, FESATIO, BAROCO, secundum. 3. Tertia DARATI, DISAMIS, DATISI, FELATIO, BOKARDO, FERISON, habet. Quarta Insuper addit. 4. BRAMANTIP, CAMENES, DINARIA, FESAPO, FESALON.

The mood of a syllogism depends on the quality (affirmative or negative) and quantity (universal or particular) of its propositions, which are marked thus:

Universal. . . . A. Affirmative. E. Negative. Particular. . . . I. Affirmative. O. Negative.

Thus, the vowels of BARBARA denote three Universal Affirmative propositions; that of CEIAREnt, a Universal Negative; a Universal Affirmative; and a Universal Negative; and so on. A syllogism is said to be valid when the conclusion logically follows from the premises; if the conclusion does not so follow, the syllogism is invalid and constitutes a fallacy if the error deceives the reasoner himself, but if it is advanced with the intention of deceiving others, it constitutes a sophism. The following rules for the construction of syllogisms are those given by Whately:

- 1. Every syllogism has three, and only three, terms. [UNRESTRICTED-MIDDLE.] 2. Every syllogism has three, and only three propositions. 3. No term must be distributed in the conclusion which was not distributed in one of the premises. 4. From negative premises nothing can be inferred. 5. If one premise be negative the conclusion must be negative.

* 2. The act or art of syllogizing, or of reasoning syllogistically.

* A man knows first, and then he is able to prove syllogistically. So that syllogism comes after knowledge, and then a man has little or no use of it. -Locke: Hum. Understanding, bk. iv., ch. xvii.

syll-lō-gist-ic, * syll-lō-gist'-ic-al, a. [Lat. syllogisticus; Gr. συλλογιστικός (sullogistikos).] Pertaining to, or consisting of a syllogism, or of the form of reasoning by syllogisms.

* No syllogistical reasoning can be right and conclusive but what has, at least, one general proposition to it. -Locke: Hum. Underst., bk. iv., ch. xvii.

syll-lō-gist'-ic-al-ly, adv. [Eng. syllogistical; -ly.] In a syllogistic manner; in the form of, or by means of syllogism.

* Well; be the consequence what it will, you are attempting to prove your point syllogistically. -Waterland: Works, lib. 21.

* syll-lō-gi-zā-tion, s. [Eng. syllogiz(e); -ation.] A reasoning by means of syllogism.

* The soul, and its powers both of Intuition and syllogization. -Harris: Three Treat. p. 265. (Note.)

* syll-lō-gize, * syll-lō-gize, v.t. [Fr. syllogizer; Gr. συλλογίζομαι (sullogizomai).] [SYLLOGISM.] To reason by means of syllogisms.

* To teach boys to syllogize, or frame arguments and refute them, without any real inward knowledge of the question. -Watte: Logic, pt. iii., ch. li.

* syll-lō-giz-er, s. [Eng. syllogiz(e); -er.] One who syllogizes; one who reasons by syllogisms.

* Every syllogizer is not presently a match to cope with. -Bellarmine, Barouza, Stapleton. -Sir E. Dering: Speeches, p. 150.

bōll, bōy; pōut, fōwl; cat, çell, chorus, çhin, bench; go, gem; thin, this; sin, as; expect, Xenophon, exist. -ing. -clan, -tian = shan. -tion, -sion = shün; -fion, -sion = zhün. -cious, -tious, -alous = shüs. -ble, -dle, &c. = bel, del.

slyph, s. [Fr. sylphe, from Gr. σίλφη (sílfhē) = a kind of beetle or grub.] An imaginary being inhabiting the air, holding an intermediate place between material and immaterial beings. Sylphs are represented as male and female, having many human characteristics, and as mortal, but without a soul. In modern language the word is used as a feminine, and is applied figuratively to a woman of graceful and slender proportions.

"The gnomes, or demons of earth, delight in mischief; but the sylphs, whose habitation is in the air, are the best conditioned creatures imaginable; for they say, any mortals may enjoy the most intimate familiarities with these gentle spirits upon a condition very easy to all adepts, an inviolate preservation of chastity."—Pope: Letter to Mrs. A. Fermor on the Rape of the Lock.

slyph-like, a. Very graceful and slender.

* sylph-id, s. [Fr. sylphide.] A little or young sylph.

"Ye sylphs and sylphids, to your chief give ear, Fays, fairies, genii, elves, and demous, hear."
Pope: Rape of the Lock, ll. 73.

* sylph-ish, a. [Eng. sylph; -ish.] Having the form and attractiveness of a sylph.

"Fair sylphish forms."
Poetry of Antijacobin, p. 126.

syl-va, s. [Lat. = a wood, a forest.]

1. The forest trees of any country or region; a work descriptive of the forest trees of a particular district or country: as, Evelyn's Sylvia.

* 2. A poetical piece composed in a start or kind of transport. (Webster.)

* 3. A collection of poetical pieces of various kinds. (Webster.)

syl-van, a. & s. [Lat. sylvanus.]

A. As adjective:

1. Of or pertaining to a wood or forest; forest-like, rural, rustic.

2. Covered or abounding with woods; wooded, shady.

"On as we move, a softer prospect opens—Calm huts, and lawns between, and sylvan slopes."
Wordsworth: Descriptive Sketches.

3. Growing in woods.

* B. As subst.: A fabled deity of the woods; a satyr, a faun.

"From music or sylvan was he wont to ask,
In phrase poetic, inspiration fair."
Scott: Don Roderick, vl. (Intro.)

syl-van-ite, s. [After Sylvan(um), one of the first proposed names for tellurium; suff. -ite (Min.): Ger. sylvan, sylvanit, schrifters, schrift-tellur, weiss-sylvanerz, weiss-tellur; Fr. sylvane graphique, tellure auro-argentifère, sylvane blanc.]

Mineralogy:

1. An ore of Tellurium (q.v.). Crystallization, monoclinic, rarely occurring in distinct crystals, but in an aggregation resembling writing characters. Hardness, 1.5 to 2; sp. gr. 7.9 to 8.35; lustre, metallic; colour and streak, steel-gray, sometimes brass-yellow. Compos. : tellurium, 55.8; gold, 28.5; silver, 15.7 = 100, which corresponds to the formula (AgAu)3Te. Occurs usually associated with gold.

2. The same as TELLURIUM (q.v.).

* syl-vat-ic, a. [Lat. sylvaticus, sylvaticus.] Of or pertaining to woods or forests; sylvan.

* syl-vēs-tēr, * syl-vēs-tri-āl, * syl-vēs-tri-ān, a. [Lat. sylvester, sylvester.] Sylvan.

Syl-vēs-tri-āns, s. pl. [See def.]

Church Hist.: An order of monks, with the rule of St. Benedict, founded by Sylvester, or Silvester, who in 1231 established a monastery called La Grotte, at Monte Fano, in Italy, whence the Sylvestrians were sometimes called the order of Monte Fano. It was approved by Innocent IV. in 1243. Sylvester died in 1267, and was afterwards canonised.

syl-vi-a, s. [Mod. Lat., from Lat. sylvia = a wood.]

1. Astron.: [ASTEROID, 87.]

2. Ornith.: The typical genus of Sylviinae (q.v.), with eight species, from the Palearctic region to India and Ceylon, and North-east Africa. Bill rather stout, short; upper mandible decurved from the middle towards the point, which is slightly emarginate; nostrils basal, lateral, oval, and exposed; gape beset with hairs; wings moderate, first primary very short; tail with twelve feathers, generally somewhat rounded, but in some species nearly even; tarsus scaled in front and short, toes and claws short. The birds of this genus are confined to the Eastern Hemisphere, being distinct from the warblers of the United States, though some forty species of Sylvia. They are interesting from their geographical distribution, seeming to have their headquarters in the region surrounding the Mediterranean, though a number of them inhabit Central and Northern Europe. They mostly winter in Africa. They are notable for the sweetness of their song, their elegant shape and graceful movement. In color they are inconspicuous, being usually brown, grey, or olive green. The Common White-throat (Sylvia rufa) is perhaps the best known. Other species include S. curruca, the Lesser White-throat, S. calcearia, the Garden Warbler, S. atricapilla, the Blackcap, and S. arpea, the Orphean Warbler. The Blackcap is a songster of fine powers, by many considered the equal of the Nightingale, which has gained much of its reputation from its habit of singing at night. The Garden Warbler is also a very pleasing songster.

syl-vi-an, a. [See def.] Of or belonging to Silvius, born in Flinders in 1614, and subsequently Professor of Medicine in Leyden University.

sylvian-fissure, s. [FISSURE, s., ¶ 3.]

syl-vic, a. [Lat. sylv(a); -ic.] A synonym of abietic (q.v.).

sylvic-acid, s. [ABETIC-ACID.]

syl-vic-ō-la, s. [Lat. sylvicola, sylvicola = an inhabitant of woods; sylvia, silva = a wood, and colō = to inhabit.]

Ornith.: Fly-catching Warbler, a genus of Paridae, instituted by Swinson. Bill slender, notched a little way from the tip; rictus weakly bristled; wings long, the first quill nearly or quite as long as the other; feet slender. Chiefly from North America. Species, Sylvicola americana, S. canadensis, &c.

* syl-vi-ōul-ture, s. [Lat. sylvia = a wood, s forest, and cultura = culture (q.v.).] The culture of forest trees; arboriculture, forestry.

syl-vi-i-dēs, * syl-vi-a-dēs, s. pl. [Formed from Mod. Lat. sylvia (q.v.), with Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -idēs.]

Ornith.: Warblers; a family of Passerine Birds, distinguished from the Thrushes (of which, in some classifications, they form a sub-family) by their delicate structure and more subulate bill. They are almost universally distributed, preponderating greatly in the eastern hemisphere. Caon Tristram divides the family into seven sub-families: Drymœcina, Calamoborina, Phylloscopina, Sylvinae, Ruticillinae, Saxicolinae, and Accentorinae.

syl-vi-i-næ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. sylvia(a); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -inæ.]

Ornithology:

1. A sub-family of Turdidae, approximately equivalent to No. 2.

2. The typical sub-family of Sylviidae (q.v.), with six genera and thirty-three species; most abundant in the Palearctic region; very scarce in the Australian and Oriental regions; absent from America. [SYLVIA.]

syl-vine, syl-vite, s. [Lat. sal digestivus sylvii; suff. -ine, -ite (Min.).]

Min.: An isometric soluble salt found in large crystals at Stassfurt, Prussia. Hardness, 2.0; sp. gr. 1.9 to 2; colourless; lustre, vitreous. Compos. : potassium, 52.5; chlorine, 47.5 = 100, equal to the simple formula KCl.

sŷm-, pref. [SVN-]

Sŷ-mā, s. [Gr. Σύμη (Sumē), the daughter of Ialysus and Dotis, carried off by Glaucus.]

Ornith.: A genus of Alcedinidae, with two species from Papua and North Australia.

sŷ-mar, s. [SIMAR.]

* sŷm-bāl, s. [CYMBAL.]

sŷm-bi-ō-sis, s. [Gr. συμβίωσις (symbiōsis) = living with companionship; connexion: Gr. συν = syn (sun), and βίος (bios) = life.]

Biol.: The united life of certain organisms.

Some orchids and fungus hyphæ thus obtain nourishment in common. Monotropa hypopitys is said by F. Kamienski to derive its nourishment from the soil through the medium of a fungus mycelium which covers it. The same phenomenon is said to have been observed in oaks, beeches, hornbeams, &c.

sŷm-bi-ō-tic, a. [Gr. συμβιωτικός (symbiōtēs) = one who lives with a companion.]

Biol.: Of or belonging to Symbiosis (q.v.).

sŷm-bōl, s. [Fr. symbole = a token, &c., from Lat. symbolum; Gr. σύμβολον (sumbolon), from συνβάλλω (symballo) = to throw together: συν (sun), for syn (sun) = with, together, and βάλλω (ballō) = to throw.]

I. Ordinary Language:

* 1. In the Greek sense, a casting together, as of a contribution into a common treasury.

"There are 'portions that are behind of the offerings' of Christ, which must be filled up by his body the Church; and happy are they that put in the greatest symbol."—J. Taylor: Faith & Patience of the Saints.

* 2. Lot; sentence of adjudication.

"The persons who are to be judged . . . shall all appear to receive their symbol."—Taylor: Sermons, vol. li, ser. l.

3. A letter or character which is significant of something; a sign. [I. 1. ¶.]

4. An object, animate or inanimate, standing for, representing, or calling up something moral or intellectual; an emblem, a figure, a type, a representation.

"Salt, as incorruptible, was the symbol of friendship; which, if it casually fell, was distinguished omnium."—Brown: vulgar Errors.

5. That which specially distinguishes one regarded in a particular character, or as occupying a particular office, and fulfilling its duties; a figure marking the individuality of some being or thing: as, A trident is the symbol of Neptune.

II. Technically:

1. Chem.: An abbreviation of the name of an elementary body: thus C for carbon, H, hydrogen, P, phosphorus, &c. When two or more of the names begin with the same letter, a second letter is added to the symbol of one of these elements for the sake of distinction: thus Cl = chlorine, Hg = hydrargyrum (mercury), Pb = plumbum (lead), &c. The symbol also represents a definite quantity of the element: thus H always = one part by weight of hydrogen, Hg = 200 parts of mercury. [BOND, FORMULA, NOMENCLATURE, NOTATION.]

2. Theology:

(1) A primitive name for the Creed, often occurring in the works of the early Fathers. The precise meaning of the word symbol in this sense is doubtful; but it probably had reference to the Creed as the common bond of Faith. The tradition that the name was given because each of the Apostles composed an article, is unsupported by evidence.

(2) Sometimes applied to the elements in the Sacrament of the Eucharist.

¶ Mathematical symbols: There are four kinds of symbols employed in mathematics. (1) Those which stand for quantities; such as letters standing for numbers, time, space, or any of the geometrical magnitudes. (2) Those of relation, as the signs, =, >, <, ::, &c., which indicate respectively, the relations of equality, inequality, proportion, &c. (3) Those of abbreviation, as, ∴, for hence, ∵, for because; exponents and co-efficients are likewise symbols of abbreviation, the symbol consisting in the manner of writing these numbers. (4) Symbols of operation, or those employed to denote an operation to be performed, or a process to be followed; such are the symbols of algebra and the differential and integral calculus, &c., which do not come under the preceding heads. Those of the third class are generally regarded as symbols of operation. Symbols of operation are of two kinds: (1) Those which indicate invariable processes, and are, in all cases, susceptible of uniform interpretations. This kind includes most of what are usually called the signs of algebra, as +, −, ×, ÷, √. (2) Those which indicate general methods of proceeding without reference to the nature of the quantity to be operated upon.

Teleg.: A system of printing in dots and marks or other cipher, as distinct from printing in the usual Roman letter. The dots and dashes of the Morse, or similar systems, may fāte, fāt, fāre, amidst, whāt, fāl, father; wē, wēt, hēre, camel, hēr, thērs; pine, pīt, sire, sir, marine; gō, pōt, or, wōre, wqf, work, whō, sōn; mūte, cūb, cūre, unite, cūr, rūle, fūll; trŷ, Sŷrian. æ, œ = ē; ey = ā; qu = kw.

be produced by pressure on, or penetration of the paper (Morse), or by a chemical action at the point of contact of the styles (Bain), or the passage of the electric current.

• sým-ból, v.t. [SYMBOL, s.] To express or represent by a symbol; to symbolize.

• sým-ból-é-óg-ra-phý, s. [Gr. συμβόλαιον (symbolion) = a mark or sign from which one concludes anything, a contract, and γράφω (graphō) = to write.] [SYMBOL.]

Law: The art or cunning of rightly forming and making written instruments. It is either judicial or extra-judicial, the latter being wholly occupied with such instruments as concern matters not yet judicially in controversy, such as instruments of agreements or contracts, and testaments or last wills. (Wharton.)

• sým-ból-a-tróus, a. [SYMBOLATRY.] Apt or inclined to worship, reverence, or over-estimate symbols or types.

• sým-ból-a-trý, s. [Gr. σύμβολον (symbolon) = a symbol, and λατρεία (latreia) = service, worship.] The worship, reverence, or over-estimation of symbola or types.

• sým-ból-íc, a. & s. [Gr. συμβολικός (symbolikos); Fr. symbolique.]

A. As adj.: The same as SYMBOLICAL (q.v.).
"The symbolic way of writing is of three kinds: the first is that plain and common one of imitating the figure of the thing represented; the second is by typical marks; and the third is a contrary way of allegorizing by enigmas."—Warburton: Divine Legation, bk. iv., § 4.

B. As subst.: The same as SYMBOLICS (q.v.).

• sým-ból-íc-al, a. [Eng. symbolic; -al.]
1. Ord. Lang.: Pertaining to a symbol or symbols; of the nature of a symbol; standing for or serving the purpose of a symbol; representative.
"This seems a clear conclusion from the very nature of our Lord's miracles, which, for the most part, were actions distinctly symbolical of one or other of the spiritual benefits of the redemption."—Bp. Horley: Sermons, vol. 1, ser. 14.

2. Gram.: Applied to words which by themselves present no meaning to any mind, and which depend for their intelligibility on a relation to some presentive word or words. Pronouns, prepositions, conjunctions, and the auxiliary verbs are symbolic words. [PRESENTIVE.]

symbolic-attributes, s. pl.
Art: Certain figures or symbols usually introduced in representations of the evangelists, apostles, saints, &c., as the keys of St. Peter, the lamb of St. Agnes, &c.

symbolical-books, s. pl.
Church Hist.: The writings in which any Christian communion officially publishes its distinctive tenets.

symbolical-delivery, s.
Law: The delivery of property sold or resigned by delivering something else as a symbol, token, or representative of it.

symbolical-philosophy, s. The philosophy expressed by hieroglyphics.

• sým-ból-íc-al-ly adv. [Eng. symbolical; -ly.] In a symbolical manner; by symbols or signs; typically.

"They likewise worshipped the same deity symbolically to Bre."—Cudworth: Intellect. System, p. 286.

• sým-ból-íc-al-néss, s. [Eng. symbolical; -ness.] The quality or state of being symbolical.

• sým-ból-ics, s. [SYMBOLIC.]
1. The study of the symbols and the mysterious rites of antiquity.
2. The study of the history and contents of Christian creeds and confessions of faith.

• sým-ból-ism, s. [Eng. symbol; -ism.]
1. Ordinary Language:
The investing of things, as certain practices in ritual, with a symbolic meaning; the regarding of outward things as having an inner and symbolic meaning; the representing of events by causes or types: such as the sword, the cause of death; the palm, the type of victory, &c.

"Symbolism [is] the name applied to the system which invested the forms of Christian architecture and ritual with a symbolical meaning. The extent to which this symbolism was carried has been a subject of much controversy."—Brandes & Coz.

• 2. An exposition or comparison of symbols or creeds.

II. Gram.: The quality or state of being symbolic (q.v.).

• sým-ból-íst, s. [Eng. symbol; -íst.] One who symbolizes; one who employs symbols.

• sým-ból-íst-íc, • sým-ból-íst-íc-al, a. [Eng. symbol; -ístic, -ístical.] Characterized by the use of symbols: as, symbolistic poetry.

• sým-ból-i-zá-tion, s. [Eng. symbolize(e); -ation.] The act of symbolizing; representation; resemblance.

"Often wracked beyond their symbolizations, enlarged into constructions disparaging their true intentions."—Browne: Judger Errors, bk. v., ch. xxi.

• sým-ból-ize, v.t. & t. [Fr. symboliser.] [SYMBOL, s.]

A. Transitive:

1. To represent by a symbol or symbols.

2. To regard or treat as symbolic; to make symbolic or representative of something.

"There want not some who have symbolized the apple of Paradise into such constructions."—Browne: Judger Errors, bk. vii., ch. i.

• 3. To make to agree in properties.

B. Intransitive:

1. To use symbols; to express or represent things in symbols or symbolically.

• 2. To agree, to harmonize; to have a resemblance in qualities or properties.

"The Orphic philosophy did really agree and symbolize with that which afterward was called Pythagoric and Platonic."—Cudworth: Intellect. System, p. 276.

• 3. To hold the same faith or religious belief; to agree in faith.

• sým-ból-íz-ér, s. [Eng. symbolize(e); -er.] One who symbolizes; one who casts in his vote, opinion, &c., with another.

"Their ambitious symbolizers in England."—Gauden: Tears of the Church, p. 691.

• sým-ból-óg-íc-al, a. [Eng. symbology(y); -ical.] Of or pertaining to symbology (q.v.).

• sým-ból-ó-gíst, s. [Eng. symbology(y); -íst.] One versed in symbology (q.v.).

• sým-ból-ó-gý, s. [Gr. σύμβολον (symbolon) = a symbol, and λόγος (logos) = a word, a discourse.] The art of expressing by symbols; symbolization.

• sým-ból-lüm (pl. sým-ból-la), s. [SYMBOL, s.] A contribution.

"My symbolum towards so charitable a work."—Hammond: Paraphrase on the Psalms. (Pref.)

• sým-bór-ó-dón, s. [Pref. sým; Gr. βορός (boros) = glutinous, and suff. -odon.]
Palæont.: A genus of Perissodactyla, founded by Cope, on remains from the Miocene of North America. It approximately corresponds to Marsh's genus Bronthotherium (q.v.).

• sým-brån-chí-dæ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. symbranchus(us); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -idæ.]
Ichthy.: A family of Physostomi (q.v.); eel-like fishes, having the body naked or covered with minute scales; the upper jaw is entirely formed by the premaxillary bones, the maxillaries being placed behind them in a parallel position. Pectoral and ventral fins are absent, and the vertical fins are reduced to membranous folds; there is no swimming-bladder, and the stomach is without pyloric appendages. The family is divided into the three following groups, the first two of which are freshwater, but sometimes entering brackish water; the third is marine:

- 1. AMPHYPTERUS, containing one genus, with a single species, Amphipterus cuchia, from Bengal.
- 2. SYMBRANCHIA, with two genera, Monopterus and Symbranchus (q.v.).
- 3. CHILORRANCHINA, containing one genus, with a single species, Chilorranchus dorsalis, from Australia and Tasmania.

• sým-brån-chí-na, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. symbranchus(us); Lat. neut. pl. adj. suff. -ina.] [SYMBRANCHIDÆ, 2.]

• sým-brån-chüs, s. [Mod. Lat., from pref. sým, and Gr. βράγχια (branchia) = gills.]
Ichthy.: The typical genus of the group Symbranchia, and the family Symbranchidæ (q.v.). Vent in the posterior half of the body, which is naked; four branchial arches, with well-developed gills. Two species: Symbranchus marmoratus, common in tropical America, S. bengalensis, common in the East Indies.

Sým-mäch-i-gnå, s. pl. [See def.]

Eccles. Hist.: A name sometimes given to the Nazarenes, probably from Symmachus the Ebionite, who is mentioned by Eusebius (Hist. Eccles., vi. 17). St. Ambrose (died 387), however, speaks of the Symmachians as descended from the Pharisees, and the sect was in existence in the time of St. Augustine of Hippo (354-430).

• sým-mét-ral, a. [SYMMETRY.] Commensurate, symmetrical.

"It was both the doctrine of the apostles, and the practice of the church, while it was symmetrical, to obey the magistrate."—More: Mystery of Godliness, p. 264.

• sým-mét-ri-an, s. [Eng. symmetry; -an.] One studious of proportion or symmetry of parts.

"His face was a thought longer than the exact symmetrians would allow."—Sidney: Arcadia.

• sým-mét-ric-al, • sým-mét-ric, a. [Eng. symmetry(y); -ic, -ical.]

I. Ord. Lang.: Possessing, exhibiting, or characterized by symmetry; well-proportioned in its parts; having its parts in due proportion as to dimensions. "The symmetric step! How he trends true to time and place and thing."—R. Browning: Balaustion's Adventure.

II. Technically:

1. Bot. (Of the parts of a flower): Related to each other in number, the same in number, or one a multiple of the other, as in Saxifraga, which has five divisions of the calyx, five petals, and five stamens; or Epilobium, which has a four-parted calyx, four petals, and eight stamens.

2. Math.: Possessing the attribute of symmetry; having corresponding parts or relations. In geometry, two points are symmetrically disposed with respect to a straight line, when they are on opposite sides of the line and equally distant from it, so that a straight line joining them intersects the given line, and is at right angles to it. A curve is symmetrical with respect to a straight line, when for each point on one side of the line there is a corresponding point on the other side, and equally distant from it. The line is called an axis of symmetry. In conic sections, the axes are the only true axes of symmetry. Two plane figures are symmetrically situated with respect to a straight line, when each point of one has a corresponding point in the other on the opposite side of the axis, and equally distant from it. A line or surface is symmetrical with respect to a plane, when for each point on one side of the plane there is a second point on the other side, equally distant from it. The plane is called the plane of symmetry, and is, in conic sections, a principal plane. Symmetrical lines and surfaces in space cannot, in general, be made to coincide with each other. Spherical triangles are symmetrical when their sides and angles are equal each to each, but not similarly situated. In analysis, an expression is symmetrical with respect to two letters, when the places of these letters may be changed without changing the expression. Thus, the expression $x^2 + ax + ab + bx^2$ is symmetrical with respect to a and b ; for, if we change the place of a and b , we have $x^2 + bx + ba + ax^2$, the same expression. An expression is symmetrical with respect to several letters, when any two of them may change places without affecting the expression; thus, the expression $ab + ba^2 + a^2c + c^2a + b^2c + cb^2$ is symmetrical with respect to the three letters a, b, c .

• sým-mét-ric-al-ly, adv. [Eng. symmetrical; -ly.] In a symmetrical manner; with due proportion of parts.

• sým-mét-ric-al-néss, s. [Eng. symmetrical; -ness.] The quality or state of being symmetrical.

• sým-mé-trí-clan, s. [Eng. symmetry(y); -ician.] The same as SYMMETRIAN (q.v.).

"Sith the longest rib is common to about the fourth part of a man, as some rousing symmetricians affirm."—Bolingbroke: Descrip. Britain, ch. 1.

• sým-mé-trist, s. [Eng. symmetry(y); -íst.] One who is studious or particular about symmetry or due proportion of parts; a symmetrian.

"This is the clearest reason why some exact symmetrists have been blamed for being too true."—Maitland: Wottoniana, p. 55.

• sým-mé-trizo, v.t. [Eng. symmetry(y); -ize.]

ból, böy; poüt, jöwl; cat, çell, chorus, çhin, benç; go, gem; thin, þis; sin, aç; expect, çenophon, çexist. ph = ç

To make symmetrical or proportional in its parts; to reduce to symmetry.

sym-mēt-rō-phō-hi-a, s. An apparent dread or avoidance of symmetry, especially as shown in Egyptian architecture, or in Japanese art. (Humorous.) sym-mē-trý, sim-me-trie*, sym-me-trie*, s. [O. Fr. symmetrie (Fr. symétrie), from Lat. symmetria; Gr. συμμετρία (symmetria) = due proportion, from συμμετρος (symmetros) = of like measure, with συν (syn) for σύν (syn) = with, and μετρον (metron) = a measure.]

I. Ord. Lang.: A due proportion of the several parts of a body to each other; adaptation of parts to each other; union and conformity of the members of a work to the whole proportion; harmony.

II. Technically:

1. Botany:

(1) A term used when the four verticils constituting a flower alternate with each other. The symmetry may be dimerous, trimerous, tetramerous, or pentamerous; i. e., the number of pieces composing each verticil may be two, as in Circeæ; three, as in Iris; four, as in Crothra; or five, as in Convolvulus. The symmetry may be marked by the multiplication, the deduplication, the union, the arrest of, or the inequality in, the development of the several parts.

(2) An arrangement by which every part is balanced by some other one, as that one pair of leaves is balanced by the next.

2. Compar. Anat.: Harmony and correspondence between certain parts of the body of an animal. Symmetry may be:

(1) Bilateral: as in the arms of man, the wings of a bird, and the pectoral fins of a fish. This correspondence is purely external, and its absence is immediately noticed on an examination of the viscera.

(2) Serial: as the correspondence between the arm and leg in man, and the fore and hind legs of a horse, though this is not obvious without examination, owing to the different directions in which the knee and elbow are bent. On dissection, however, serial symmetry is seen to persist internally, as in the ribs and vertebrae, which are placed one after another in a series.

(3) Zonal: a name sometimes applied to the serial symmetry of segmented animals.

(4) [RADIATED-SYMMETRY.]

† Uniform symmetry:

Arch.: That disposition of parts in which the same ordonnance reigns throughout the whole.

sym mor-phūs, s. [Gr. σύνμορφος (symmorphos) = conformed to, similar.]

Ornith.: A genus of Campephagidæ, with one species, Symmorhus leucopygus, from Australia.

sym-pa-thēt-ic, sym-pa-thēt-ic-al, a. [Formed from sympathy (q. v.), on analogy of pathetic (q. v.)]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Pertaining to, characterized by, expressive of, or produced by sympathy.

"To sympathetic tears the ghosts themselves
He moved; these promises his verse he owes."
Copeley: To his Father.

2. Having sympathy or common feeling with another; affected by feelings like those of another, or susceptible of feelings in consequence of what another feels.

"Your sympathetic hearts she hopes to move From tender friendship and endearing love."
Prior: Epilogue to Mrs. Manley's Luctus.

3. Agreeing, or in accord with the feelings experienced by another; in harmony and concord.

"Now o'er the soothed accordant heart we feel A sympathetic twilight slowly steal." Wordsworth: Country Walk.

4. Causing or attended with sympathy.

"For cold reserve had lost its power,
In sorrow's sympathetic hour."
Scott: Rokeby, v. 11.

II. Physiol. & Pathol.: Produced by or arising from sympathy.

sympathetic-ink, s. A colorless ink, the writing made with which is made visible by a subsequent operation—warmth, or other reacting stimulant.

sympathetic-medicine, s.
Anthrop.: An old method of treatment based on magic, and owing its origin, in every case, to the fact that a subjective connection between the malady or injury and the means of cure was mistaken for a real and objective connection. Well-known examples of this mode of treatment are Sir Kanelm Digby's Sympathetic Powder (q. v.), the Doctrine of Signatures, and the practice of Chinese physicians at the present day, who, in the absence of a necessary drug, will write the prescription on a piece of paper and administer an infusion of the writing in water, or the ashes of the burnt paper, to the sick man. Dryden, in his version of the Tempest (v. 2), introduces this treatment by sympathy; and how closely it is connected with magic may be seen in the Lady of the Last Minster (iii. 22), where the Lady Margaret acts as leech to the wounded William of Deloraine:

"She drew the splinter from the wound,
And with a charm she stanch'd the blood."
Then, taking the broken lance, she "Washed it from the clotted gore, And advis'd the splinter o'er and o'er."

sympathetic nerve, s.

Anat.: A nerve, or system of nerves, running from the base of the skull to the coccyx, along both sides of the body, and consisting of a series of ganglia along the spinal column by the side of the vertebrae. With this trunk of the sympathetic there are communicating branches which connect the ganglia, or the intermediate cord, with all the spinal, and several of the cranial nerves proceeding to primary branches on the neighboring organs or other ganglia, and finally numerous flexures of nerves running to the viscera. Various fibres from the sympathetic communicate with those of the cerebro-spinal system. The term sympathetic has been applied on the supposition that it is the agent in producing sympathy between different parts of the body. It more certainly affects the secretions. Called also Sympathetic system.

Old Med.: Powder of Sympathy. A powder of vitriol, introduced by Sir Kanelm Digby (1603-65), who published a small book (A Late Discourse, &c.) on its merits, and made known the method of its preparation in his Chymical Secrets (p. 270). The powder was said to be highly efficacious "in stanching of desperate bleeding at the nose, in stanching the blood of a wound, and in curing any green wound (where there is no fracture of bones) without any plaister or ointment, in a few days." In the case of an incised wound, the powder was infused in water, and "into this water they did put a clout or rag of cloth embrued with the blood of the party hurt (the rag being first dry), but if it was fresh and moist with the reaking blood, there was no need but to powder it with the small powder of the same vitriol" (p. 138). Sir Kanelm (p. 148) goes on to say that "the same cure is performed by applying the remedy to the blade of a sword which hath wounded a person." The wound itself was to be washed clean, the edges brought into apposition, and bandaged. Dunglisoo (Hist. Med., p. 237), hereupon remarks: "Under such treatment it was of little importance what application was made to the instrument; binding up the wound, bringing the edges in apposition, defending it from extraneous irritants, and leaving it to the restorative power which is seated in almost every part of an organized body, is the approved method of managing incised wounds at the present day."

sympathetic-sounds, s. pl. Sounds produced from solid bodies by means of vibrations of some sounding body, these vibrations being communicated by means of the air or some intervening solid body.

sym-pa-thēt-ic-al-lý, adv. [Eng. sympathetical; -ly.] In a sympathetic manner; with sympathy; in consequence of sympathy; by communication from something else.

"Wherefore the plastic nature . . . must be concluded to act fatally, magically, and sympathetically."
Cudworth: Intel. System, p. 161.

sym-pa-thise, v. i. & t. [SYMPATHIZE.]

* sym-pa-thist, s. [Eng. sympathist]; -ist. One who sympathizes; one who feels sympathy; a sympathizer.

sym-pa-thize, v. i. & t. [Fr. sympathiser.] [SYMPATHY.]

A. Intransitive:

1. To have sympathy; to have a common feeling with another, as of pain or pleasure.

"The limbs of his body is to every one a part of himself: he sympathizes, and is concerned for them."
Locke: Human Understanding, bk. II, ch. xxvii.

2. To feel in consequence of what another feels; to feel mutually; to be affected with feelings similar to those of another, in consequence of something felt or experienced by such other.

"We continually sympathize with the sentiments and affections of the company among whom we converse."
Search: Lights of Nature, vol. 1, pt. II, ch. xix.

3. To express sympathy; to condole.

"To feel her woes and sympathize in tears."
Pitt: Vida: Art of Poetry, II.

* 4. To agree, to fit, to harmonize.

"Green is a pleasing colour, from a blue and a yellow mixed together, and by consequence blue and yellow are two colours which sympathize."
Jruden: Dufresnoy.

* 5. To agree; to be of the same disposition.

"The men do sympathize with the mastiffs in robustness and rough coming on."
Shakspeare: Henry V., III. 7.

B. Transitive:

1. To have sympathy for; to share, to participate.

"By this sympathized one day's error Has suffered wrong."
Shakspeare: Comedy of Errors, v. 7.

2. To form so as to harmonize; to form with suitable adaptation; to contrive with congruity or consistency.

"A message well sympathized; a horse to be ambassador for an ass."
Shakspeare: Love's Labour's Lost, III.

sym-pa-thiz-ēr, s. [Eng. sympathizer]; -er. One who sympathizes or feels for another, one who takes side or common action with another in any cause or pursuit.

sym-pa-thý, sym-pa-thie, s. [Fr. sympathie, from Lat. sympathia; Gr. συνάθεα (synatheia) = like feeling, fellow-feeling; συνπαθής (sympathēs) = of like feelings; συν (syn), for σύν (syn) = with, and παθεῖν (patheîn), 2 aor. infin. of πάσχω (paschō) = to suffer.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Feeling corresponding to that felt by another; the quality or state of being affected by the affections of another, with feelings corresponding in kind if not in degree; compassion, fellow-feeling, commiseration. (Followed by for before the person sympathized with.)

"Pleased it returned as soon with answering looks Of sympathy and love."
Milton: P. L., IV. 466.

¶ Sympathy is first evoked in small societies, such as a single family or a small tribe, and gradually extends beyond these limits. After a time it is found capable of embracing a nation, but foreigners excite antipathy rather than sympathy. Next it entertains a certain amount of beneficent feeling towards mankind in general. One of its latest moral acquisitions is to go forth towards the lower animals, as shown, for example, by the efforts to prevent their being cruelly and thoughtlessly treated. The latter possess it among themselves; thus Indian crows have been seen feeding two or three of their companions which were blind.

2. An agreement of affections or inclinations; a conformity of natural temperament, which makes two persons pleased or in accord with each other; mutual or reciprocal affection or passion; community of inclination or disposition. (Followed by with.)

"It was no assemblage of distinct bodies, none of which had any strong sympathy with the rest, and some of which had a positive antipathy for each other."
Miscellany: Hist. Eng., ch. xxiv.

* 3. Correspondence, agreement.

"His Impressa was a Catoblepas, which so long lies dead, as the moon, whereto it hath so natural a sympathy, wants a light."
Sidney: Arcadia, bk. III.

4. A tendency of certain inanimate things to unite with or act on each other: as, the sympathy between the loadstone and iron.

II. Physiology & Pathology:

1. Reciprocal action of the different parts of the body on each other; an affection of one part of the body in consequence of something taking place in another. Thus, when there is a local injury the whole frame after a time suffers with it. A wound anywhere will tend to create feverishness everywhere; derangement of the stomach will produce headache, liver complaint will produce pain in the shoulder, &c.

2. The influence exerted over the susceptible

organization of one person, as of a hysterical female, by the sight of paroxysms of some nervous disease in another or in others.

According to the derivation of the words, sympathy may be said of either pleasure or pain; compassion and condolence only of that which is painful. Sympathy preserves its original meaning in its application, for we laugh or cry by sympathy; this may, however, be merely a physical operation; but compassion is altogether a moral feeling, which makes us enter into the distresses of others: we may, therefore, sympathize with others, without essentially serving them; but if we feel compassion, we naturally turn our thoughts towards relieving them. Compassion is awakened by those sufferings which are attributable to our misfortunes; compassion may be awakened by persons in very unequal conditions of life; condolence supposes an entire equality.

sym-rop-sia, s. [Pref. sym-, and Gr. ρῆσις (rhapsis) = a ripening.]

Med.: A ripening of inflammatory humours.

sym-pēt-a-loia, a. [Pref. sym-, and Gr. πῆλον (pēlon) = a leaf.]

Bot.: Gamopetalous (q.v.) (Thomé.)

sym-phōr-ān-thēr-ōus, a. [Gr. συμφορά (symphora) = a bringing together, and ἀνθῆρος (anthēros).] [ANTHER.]

Bot.: Syngenesious (q.v.)

*sym-phōr-nōm-ēn-ē, s. pl. [Pref. sym-, and pl. of Eng. phenomenon (q.v.)] Natural sounds or appearances of a kind or character similar to others expressed or exhibited by the same object. (Stormonth.)

*sym-phō-nōm-ēn-ai, a. [SYMPHENOMENA.] Of or pertaining to symphenomena; designating significant words imitative of natural sounds or phenomena. (Stormonth.)

sym-phō-nī-a, s. [Lat.] A symphony (q.v.)

sym-phōn-ic, a. [SYMPHONY.]

1. Ord. Lang.: The same as SYMPHONIOUS (q.v.)

2. Music: Pertaining or relating to or characteristic of a symphony.

"In presence of a symphonic poem there is a craving of the human mind to know what it is all about." -Daily Telegraph, Feb. 25, 1882.

sym-phō-nī-ōus, a. [Eng. symphony; -ous.]

1. Ord. Lang.: Agreeing in sound; harmonious.

"The sound of ten thousand harps, that tuned Angelic harmonies." Milton: P. L., vii, 433.

2. Music: The same as SYMPHONIC (q.v.)

sym-phō-nist, s. [Fr. symphoniste.]

1. A chorister. (Blount.)

2. A composer of symphonies, as Beethoven, Mozart, and Haydn.

*sym-phō-nize, v. i. [Eng. symphon(y); -ize.] To agree, to harmonize.

"I mean the law and the prophets symphonizing with the gospel." -Boyle: Style of Holy Scriptures, p. 284.

sym-phō-nŷ, *sim-pho-nie, *sym-fo-nye, *sym-pho-nie, s. [Fr. symphonie, from Lat. symphonia; Gr. συμφωνία (symphōnia) = music, harmony, from συμφωνός (symphōnos) = agreeing in sound; harmonious: συμ (sym), for συν (sun) = with, and φωνή (phōnē) = sound.]

1. Ord. Lang.: A consonance or harmony of sounds, vocal or instrumental, or both, which are agreeable to the ear.

"She sang, and still a harp unseen Filled up the symphony between." Scott: Lady of the Lake, l. 30.

II. Music:

1. A composition for an orchestra, similar in construction to the sonata, which is usually for a single instrument. A symphony has several varied movements, generally four, never less than three. The first, an allegro; the second, a largo, or andante; the third, a scherzo, or minuet and trio; and the fourth, an allegro. The form of the first and last movement is usually the same as that of the sonata. The scherzo, or the minuet, in some symphonies is placed before, instead of after, the slow movement.

2. Formerly overtures were called symphonies. Handel called the overture "Sinfonia," and it was a common practice in his time to name any long instrumental piece after this manner.

3. The introductory, intermediate, and concluding instrumental parts of a song or other vocal piece are also called symphonies.

*4. A name anciently given to certain musical instruments, as the virginal and bagpipe.

sym-phōr-ī-a, s. [Gr. συμφορά (symphora) = a bringing together.]

Bot.: The same as SYMPHORICARPUS (q.v.)

sym-phōr-ī-car-pōus, a. [Gr. συμφορά (symphora) = a bringing together, and καρπός (karpos) = fruit.]

Bot.: Bearing fruits clustered together.

sym-phōr-ī-car-pūs, s. [SYMPHORICARPUS. Named from the cluster of berries.]

Bot.: St. Peter's wort, a genus of Lonicæeæ, with a four-celled ovary, having two cells abortive, and the other two each with one hard seed. North American shrubs: Symphoricarpos racemosus is the Snow-berry (q.v.); S. vulgaris the common St. Peter's wort, a native of the United States, which has red cup-shaped berries.

sym-phōr-ūs, s. [Gr. σύμφωρος (symphoros) = useful, profitable.]

Jchthy.: A genus of Percidæ, from the Indo-Pacific, closely allied to Dentex (q.v.), which is now generally placed with the Percidæ.

sym-phŷl-i-ōus, a. [Pref. sym-, and Gr. φύλλον (phullon) = a leaf.]

Bot.: Gamophyllous (q.v.)

sym-phŷ-ō-stē-mōn, s. [Gr. συμφῶν (symphōn) = to cause to grow together, and στήλην (stēlēn).] [STAMEN.]

Bot.: The union of stamens by their filaments; the state of being monadelphous.

sym-phŷs-ān-droūs, a. [Gr. σύμφυσις (symphusis) = union, and ἀνδρῶν (andrōn), genit. ἀνδρός (andros) = a male.]

Bot. (Of stamens): In a state of coalescence, as the filaments and anthers of Cucurbitaceæ and Lobeliaceæ.

sym-phŷs-ē-al, a. [Eng. symphysis(is); -eal.] Of or pertaining to symphysis (q.v.)

sym-phŷs-ē-ō-tōme, s. [Eng. symphysis (q.v.), and Gr. τομή (tomē) = a cutting.]

Surg.: A knife used in the Sigaultian section.

sym-phŷs-ē-ōt-ō-mŷ, s. [SYMPHYSEOTOME.]

Surg.: The Sigaultian section (q.v.)

sym-phŷ-sis, s. [Gr. = a growing together: συμ (sym), for συν (sun) = together, and φῦσις (phusis) = a growing; φῦν (phūn) = to grow.]

1. Anat.: The union of two bones, in which there is little or no motion.

2. Bot.: The growing together or union of two parts.

sym-phŷt-ism, s. [Gr. συμφῦσις (symphusis) = to grow together.] [SYMPHYTISM.]

Philol.: A term applied by Earle to a tendency, in that class of words called by him symbolic, to attach themselves to other words, so that the resulting compound is either really one word, or presents the appearance of being one word. Symphytism is of two kinds, (1) Particle-composition and (2) Flexion.

(1) Particle-composition is when the old negative ne coalesces with the verb; thus, neil for ne wilt, nam for ne am, not = ne wot. Also when the particle a coalesces with a noun: as, winter = In the winter, or with an adjective, as abroad, around, along.

(2) Flexion is when a change of this kind gives any word a grammatical flexibility, a faculty of changing its relative office, a parsing value: as theech = thee is = so may I prosper (A.S. theon = to prosper). (Earle: Philology of the English Tongue, § 254.)

sym-phŷ-tūm, s. [Gr. σύμφυτον (symphuton) = comfrey (see def.); συμφύτος (symphutos) = grown together. Named from its supposed vulnerary qualities.]

tribe Anchuseæ. Hispid plants, with the cauline leaves sessile or decurrent; the inflorescence in terminal forked cymes; calyx five-partite or five-toothed; corolla tubular, enlarged upwards, its throat closed with connivent, lanceolate, subulate scales; stamens five; nutlets four, ovoid, smooth. Known species, fifteen, from Europe and the West of Asia. S. officinale, the Common Comfrey [Cogn. 1 (1), (5)] is a large, coarse-looking, mucilaginous herb, which has been introduced into the United States, where it is found in gardens and low grounds in the Middle States. The whole plant is rough with dense hairs.

sym-plē-ōm-ē-tēr, s. [Gr. συμπιέσις (sympiēsis) = a compression, from συμπιέζω (sympiēzō) = to press together, and συμ (sym), for συν (sun) = with, together, and μέτρον (metron) = a measure. An instrument invented by Mr. Adie, of Edinburgh, for measuring the weight of the atmosphere by the compression of a column of gas. It consists of a column of oil, supported by atmospheric pressure, and rising, not like the mercury of the barometer into a vacuum, but against a body of hydrogen gas, which acts like a spring against the column of oil; and as the elasticity of the hydrogen varies with every change of temperature, a movable thermometer-scale is attached for making the necessary corrections. The sympiesometer is graduated by placing it together with a standard barometer and thermometer in a glass vessel, in which the pressure of the air can be varied at pleasure. The top of the column is marked at the points where the barometer shows 27, 28, 29, 30, 31 inches respectively. The spaces between the marks, coinciding with the inches of mercury, are then subdivided into 100 equal parts each, and the great range makes the instrument valuable for recording minute variations, subject to correction, depending on the variation in the volume of the hydrogen due to changes of the temperature. A graduated sliding scale assists in reaching the corrected result.]

sym-plē-sīte, s. [Gr. συμ (sym), for συν (sun) = together, and πλησιάζω (plēsiāzō) = to approach.]

Min.: A monochlinic mineral, occurring in tufts of small prismatic crystals in cavities in Siderite (q.v.). Hardness, 2.5; sp. gr. 2.957; lustre on cleavage face, pearly, elsewhere vitreous; colour, celandine-green. Compos.: supposed to be an arsenate of protoxide of iron.

sym-plō-car-pūs, s. [Gr. συμπλοκή (symplōkē) = an interweaving, and καρπός (karpos) = fruit.]

Bot.: A genus of Oronticæ. Leaves large, stalked; spathe cucullate; apaxid globular, covered with perfect flowers; perianth four-parted, at last fleshy; stamens four; style four-angled; ovary one-celled; fruit confluent, one-celled, one-seeded. Symplocarpos fetidus, or Pothos fetida, so called from its fetid smell, is a powerful antispasmodic and expectorant; it is valued in America as a palliative in paroxysms of asthma.

sym-plō-cē, s. Gr. συμπλοκή (symplōkē) = a twisting together; συμ (sym), for συν (sun) = with, together, and πλοκή (plōkē) = a twisting; πλέκο (plēkō) = to twist, to twine.]

Rhet.: The repetition of one word at the beginning and of another at the end of successive clauses, as in the sentence, Mercy descended from heaven to dwell on the earth; Mercy fled back to heaven, and left the earth.

sym-plō-cō-s, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. symplocos]; Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -eæ.]

Bot.: A tribe of Styracaceæ, having the corolla quincuncial and the anthers roundish.

sym-plō-cī-um, s. [Mod. Lat., dimin. from Gr. συμπλοκή (symplōkē).] [SYMPLOCOS.]

Bot.: The spore case of a fern.

sym-plō-cōs, s. [SYMPLOCOS.]

Bot.: The typical genus of Symplocos (q.v.) Leaves alternate, exstipulate; flowers axillary; calyx half-inferior, three-parted; corolla monopetalous, three to ten-parted, white or scarlet; stamens indefinite; ovary three to five-celled, each cell with four ovules; fruit, a drupe, with three to five cells each, one-seeded. Known species about thirty. The leaves and bark of Symplocos cratogeomides yield a yellow dye; its seeds furnish an oil; its bōil, bōy; pōit, jōwī; cat, cell, orhus, chin, bench; go, gem; thin, this; sin, as; expect, Xenophon, exist. -ing. -clan, -tian = shan. -tion, -sion = shūn; -tion, -sion = zhūn. -cious, -tious, -sious = shūa. -ble, -dle, &c. = bēl, del.

bark is considered tonic, and is used in India in ophthalmia. The leaves of S. spicata are also used for dyeing; the bark with indigo to produce different shades of green. The red wood from the root of S. phyllocalyx is used by the Nepalese for caste marks; its root and leaves yield a yellow dye. The ashes of S. racemosa are employed as an alkali, as an auxiliary with other dyes, or as a tan. Its bark is cooling and astringent. It is given in India in diarrhoea, and is employed in making plasters. Mixed with sugar, it acts on relaxed mucous membranes. A decoction of the wood is made into a gargle for spongy bleeding gums. All these are trees from the Himalayas, or other Indian mountains. The bark of S. (Bobau) laurina is used in Bengal as a mordant for a red dye. S. tinctoria, the Sweet-leaf of Carolina, dyes yellow, and has a bitter and aromatic root. S. Alstonia, or Alstonia thecifolia, from New Granada, is astringent. Its leaves are used as tea.

2. Palaeobot.: The genus occurs in the London clay of Sheppey.

sym-pō-dī-āl, a. [Mod. Lat. sympodi(um); Eng. suff. -al.]

Bot. (Of inflorescence): Cymose.

sym-pō-dī-ūm, s. [Pref. sym-, and Gr. πόδιον (podion), dimin. from πούς (pous), genit. πόδος (podos) = a foot.]

Bot.: (1) A cyme; (2) a lateral branch in the inflorescence of rushes. It consists of several axes.

sym-pōs-ī-ā, s. pl. [SYMPOSIUM.]

sym-pōs-ī-āk, *sym-pōs-ī-āk, a. & s. [Fr. symposiaque, from Lat. symposium; Gr. συμπόσιος (sumposios) = of or pertaining to a symposium (q.v.).]

A. As adjective:

1. Ord. Lang.: Pertaining to symposia, merry-making, or revels; happening where company is drinking together.

From the ancient custom of sumposiac meetings to wear cheap chaplets of roses about their heads.—Broune: Vulgar Errata, bk. v, ch. xxi.

2. Music: A term applied to cheerful and convivial compositions for voices, as glees, catches, rounds, &c.

B. As subst.: A conference or conversation of philosophers at a banquet.

sym-pōs-ī-ārch, a. [Gr. συμποσιάρχης (sumposiarchēs), from συμπόσιον (sumposion) = a symposium (q.v.), and ἀρχή (archē) = to rule.]

Gr. Antiq.: The president, chairman, or director of a feast.

sym-pōs-ī-āst, s. [Gr. συμποσιαστής (sumposiastēs).] [SYMPOSIUM.] One who joins in a symposium or merry-making.

sym-pōs-ī-ōn, s. [Gr.] A symposium.

sym-pōs-ī-ūm, *sym-pōs-ī-ōn (pl. sym-pōs-ī-ā), s. [Lat., from Gr. συμπόσιον (sumposion) = a drinking-party, a banquet: σῦν (syn), for σύν (syn) = with, together, and base πό- (po-), seen in πόσις (posis) = a drinking; πίνω (pinō) = to drink, πῶ, ἑ. πίνωκα (pōpōka), aur. ἐπιπόνη (epipōnē).]

1. A drinking together; a revel, a merry-making, a banquet.

2. A magazine article on some serious topic, in which several contributors express their views in opposition, like the speakers in Plato's Banquet.

sym-tōm (p silent), *symp-tōme, *sym-tōme, s. [Fr. symp-tome, from Lat. symp-toma; Gr. συνπτώμα (synptōma) = anything that befalls one, a casualty; συνπίπτω (synpīptō) = to fall together, to fall in with: σῦν (syn), for σύν (syn) = together, and πίπτω (pīptō) = to fall.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. In the same sense as II.

The physicians speak of a certain disease or madness, called hydrophobia, the symp-tome of those that have been bitten by a mad-dog, which makes them have a monstrous antipathy to water.—Outswordsk. Intell. System, p. 133.

2. Something which indicates the existence of something else; a token, a sign, an omen, an indication.

*Astruing symp-toms had appeared in other regiments.—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xi.

II. Pathol.: A change perceptible by a patient or his physician in the appearance or functions of the body, indicating the presence of disease.

sym-p-tō-māt-īc, sym-p-tō-māt-īc-āl (p silent), a. [Gr. συμπτωματικός (sumptōmatikos), from σύνπτωμα (sumptōma), genit. συνπτωματος (synptōmatos) = a symptom (q.v.); Fr. symp-tomatique.]

1. Of or pertaining to symptoms.

2. Being or serving as a symptom, token, sign, or indication; indicating the existence of something else.

"The one is but symp-tomatical, or at most secondary, in relation to the other."—Boyle: Works, II. 197.

3. Made or arranged according to symptoms: as, a symp-tomatic classification of diseases.

symp-tomatic-disease, s.

Med.: A disease which proceeds from a prior disease in some part of the body: as, A symp-tomatic fever may proceed from a local injury or local inflammation. (Opposed to idiopathic.)

sym-p-tō-māt-īc-āl-ly (p silent), adv. [Eng. symp-tomatical; -ly.] In a symptomatic manner; by means of symptoms; in the nature of symptoms.

"The causes of a bubo are violent humours abounding in the blood, or in the nerves, excreted sometimes critically, sometimes symp-tomatically."—Wise-man: Surgery, bk. I, ch. ix.

sym-p-tō-ma-tōl-ō-gy (p silent), s. [Gr. συνπτωματος (sumptōmatos), genit. of σύνπτωμα (sumptōma) = a symptom, and λόγος (logos) = a discourse.]

Med.: The doctrine of symptoms, including diagnosis and prognosis. (See these words.)

syn-, pref. [A Latinised form of Gr. σύν (syn) = with, together. It becomes syn- before words beginning with l; sum- before words beginning with b, m, p, or ph, and en- before words beginning with s or z.] A Greek preposition, used also as a prefix, and corresponding in senses to the Lat. cum, which appears in English as con (q.v.).

syn, *syne, adv. [SINCE.]

syn-āc-mīc, a. [Eng. synacm(y); -ic.]

Bot.: Of or belonging to synacmy, having the stamens and pistils in the same flower mature at the same time.

"Fumaria officinalis, Potentilla reptans, Erica Tetraltz, Solanum Dulcamara, and Linaria Cymbalaria are synacmic plants."—Treat. of Bot. (ed. 1876), p. 345.

syn-āc-my, s. [Gr. συνακμάζω (synakmazō) = to blossom at the same time: σύν (syn) = together, and ἀκμάζω (akmazō) = to be in full bloom.] [ACMF.]

Bot.: Mr. Alfred Bennett's name for Homogamy (q.v.). Called by Hildebrand Nondichogamy.

syn-ār-ō-sīs (ær as èr), *sīn-ēr-ō-sīs, s. [Lat. synaeresis, from Gr. συναίρεσις (synaíresis) = a taking together: σύν (syn) = with, together, and αίρεσις (haíresis) = a taking; αἰρέω (haíreō) = to take.]

Gram.: The contraction of two syllables or vowels into one by the suppression of one of the syllables or the formation of a diphthong: as, nē er for never.

syn-ā-gōg-āl, a. [Eng. synagog(ue); -al.] Synagogical.

"According to the rules of the synagogal chanting."—Robertson Smith: Old Test. in Jewish Church, lect. III.

syn-ā-gōg-īc-āl, a. [Mid. Eng. synagog(e) = a synagogue (q.v.); Eng. adj. suff. -ical.] Pertaining or relating to a synagogue.

syn-ā-gōgue, *sīn-ā-gogue, *syn-ā-gōg, syn-ā-gōgo, s. [Fr. synagogue, from Lat. synagogus; Gr. συναγωγή (synagōgē) = a bringing together: σύν (syn) = together, and ἀγωγή (agōgē) = a bringing; ἀγω (agō) = to lead.]

1. Literally and Judaicly:

(1) A congregation or assembly of Jews for the purpose of worship or the performance of religious rites.

(2) A building set apart for Jewish, as a church or chapel is for Christian worship. Under the Mosaic law worship of the highest type could take place only at one chosen spot (Deut. xii. 5, 21; xvi. 6), that divinely chosen early in the monarchy being Jerusalem (2 Chron. vi. 5, 6), though gatherings took place in various other localities (2 Kings, iv.

23). Meetings at stated times for worship do not seem to have arisen till the time of the Exile, when the services of the Temple were performed in abeyance. They constituted the germ of the subsequent synagogues, which are believed to have begun among the Jews resident out of Palestine. In Psalm lxxiv. 8, the persecutors are represented as burning up all the synagogues of God in the land. Jesus taught or preached, and wrought miracles in the synagogues of Capernaum (Matt. xii. 9, Mark i. 21, Luke vii. 5, John vi. 59), in that of Nazareth (Matt. xiii. 54, Mark vi. 2, Luke iv. 16), and elsewhere (Luke iv. 15). Many Jewish synagogues are said to have existed in Jerusalem, besides one or more for foreigners (Acts vi. 9). Out of Palestine the Apostles found synagogues in Damascus (Acts ix. 2, 20), Antioch in Pisidia (xiii. 14), Iconium (xiv. 1), Thessalonica (xvii. 1), Berea (xviii. 17), Corinth (xviii. 1, 4, 8), Ephesus (xviii. 19, xix. 8), and doubtless also in other places. Synagogues were usually built on elevated sites, suggested by Prov. i. 21 and Ezra ix. 9, often outside cities and towns, by the side of a river or small stream (cf. Acts xvi. 13). The edifice was shaped like a theatre, with the door on the west side, entering which one was conventionally supposed to look eastward to Jerusalem, even though that city might be to the west of the place. This was suggested by 1 Kings viii. 29, Dan. vi. 10, &c. The wooden chest or ark containing the scrolls of the law and vestments was on the eastern side, with a canopy above, or in a recess or sanctuary. In front of it were the desks of the reader or preacher and a platform, with armchairs for the elders, who faced the ordinary worshippers. The men sat on one side of the synagogue and the women on the other; they were moreover separated by a partition about six feet high. A light was kept perpetually burning. The governing body was the elders (Acts xiii. 15), presided over by a ruler of the synagogue (Mark v. 22, Luke xiii. 14), with two judicial colleagues, three almoners or deacons, a leader of the worship (Luke iv. 20), a servant like a caretaker, and ten men of leisure pledged to attend and constitute a congregation if no others came. The Law and the Prophets were read, with liturgical prayers, chanting of the psalms, and recitals of the ten commandments, the whole concluding with a benediction. The synagogues were used not only as places of worship, but as law courts, taking cognisance of petty offences, the decisions of which were carried out within the sacred edifice (Matt. x. 17, Mark xiii. 9, Luke xii. 11, xxi. 12, Acts xxii. 19). Essentially the same arrangements obtain in the modern synagogue. The first of these on record as existing in England was at Oxford during the reign of William Rufus. A magnificent one erected in London in the reign of Henry III. was forcibly transferred to the then dominant Christian Church. In the reign of George II. only two synagogues were permitted, one for the German and the other for the Portuguese Jews; now there is no limitation, and several exist.

2. Figuratively:

(1) A Christian church (James ii. 2, Rev. ii. 9). When the Christian and Jewish churches became quite separated, the use of the word in this sense ceased.

(2) Any assembly or meeting of men.

syn-ā-gōg-uīsh, a. [Eng. synagog(ue); -ish.] Pertaining or belonging to synagogues; fanatical.

"By your party synagoguīsh."—D'Urfev: Collin's Walk, l.

syn-ā-grīs, s. [Gr. συναγρίς (synagris) = a kind of sea-fish mentioned by Aristotle.]

âte, fât, fâre, amidst, whât, fâll, father; wê, wêt, hère, camêl, hêr, thrê; pine, pît, sîrs, sîr, marine; gô, pôc, er, wôrs, wôlf, wôrck, whô, sôn; mûte, cûb, cûre, ûnite, eûr, râle, fûll; trÿ, Sÿrian. æ, œ = ê; ey = â; qu = kw.

Ichthy.: A genus of Percide, with about twenty species from the Indo-Pacific. Marine fishes of small size; body sub-elongate, covered with ciliary scales of moderate size; mouth-cleft horizontal; one continuous dorsal with feeble spine, caudal deeply forked; teeth villiform, with canines, at least, in upper jaw; brachioptegals six.

sŷn-a-lŷ-phŷ, sŷn-a-lŷ-phŷ, s. [Lat. synalepha, from Gr. συναλοφῆ (synaloiophē) = a melting together: sŷn (sun) = together, and ἀλοφῆ (aloiophē) = to anoint with oil, to daub; ἀλοφῆ (aloiophē) = fat.]

Gram.: A contraction of syllables by the suppression of some vowel or diphthong at the end of a word before another vowel or diphthong: as, th' enemy for the enemy.

sŷn-ŷl-lŷg-mŷt-ŷc, sŷn-ŷl-lŷg-mŷt-ŷc-ŷl, a. [Gr. συναλλαγματικός (synallagmatikos), from συναλλαγμα (synallagma) = a mutual agreement, a contract, from συναλλάσσω (synallassō) = to exchange, to negotiate with: sŷn (sun) = together, and ἄλλασσω (allassō) = to change.]

Civil Law: An epithet applied to a contract or treaty imposing reciprocal obligations.

sŷn-ŷl-lŷx-ŷ-nŷ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. synallaxis (is); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -inŷ.]

Ornith.: A sub-family of Dendrocolaptidae, with twelve genera, ranging from Patagonia to Mexico. The outer toe is long, and is joined to the middle toe nearly as far as the first joint; the hinder toe is long and powerful, and all the claws are sharply curved, pointed, and strong; tail long, and always pointed. Although these birds are small, they build nests as large as those of the hawk or the crow; in the majority of cases these consist of a bundle of sticks loosely thrown together, in the middle of which the nest proper is made, consisting of two recesses, and in the inner one the eggs are laid on a bed of soft feathers. [See extract under SYNALLAXINE.]

sŷn-ŷl-lŷx-ŷ-nŷ, a. [Mod. Lat. synallaxis (is); Eng. adj. suff. -inŷ.] Of or belonging to the Synallaxine; having the outer and middle toes partially united.

"The Synallaxine birds are generally found upon the trees, which they traverse with great rapidity in search of the various insects on which they feed, and may often be seen running about upon the ground, peering anxiously into every little hole and cranny and dragging slugs, snails, worms, and beetles from the recesses in which they are accustomed to conceal themselves during the hours of daylight."—Wood: Illus. Nat. Hist., II. 260.

sŷn-ŷl-lŷx-ŷ-s, [Gr. συναλλαξίς (synallaxis) = commerce, exchange.]

Ornith.: The type genus of Synallaxine (q.v.), with fifty-five species. They are divided into two groups: (1) with ten, and (2) with twelve rectrices.

sŷn-ŷn'-ŷcŷi-a, s. [Gr. συνάνκηια (synanŷkeia) = a narrow valley in which streams meet. Named from their habitat.]

Ichthy.: A genus of Scorpenidae; the general appearance of the species, especially of the head, monstrous; scaleless, soft warty protuberances or filaments on skin; mouth directed upwards, wide, villiform teeth in jaws, sometimes on vomer; eyes small; from thirteen to sixteen dorsal spines; pectorals

POISON-ORGANS OF SYNANCEIA.

A. Dorsal spines of Synanceia verrucosa (from specimen in Nat. Hist. Museum, South Kensington). B. Spine dissected, showing poison-bag.

very large. There are four species from the Indo-Pacific, attaining a length of eighteen inches at most. They are greatly dreaded on account of the wounds they can inflict with their dorsal spines, each of which, in its terminal half, is provided with a deep groove on each side, at the lower end of which is a pear-shaped bag containing the venom, and prolonged into a membranous duct, and open at the point of the spine. Persons wading with naked feet in the sea often step on these fish, which lie hidden in the sand, when the spines enter the skin, and the poison is forced into the wound by the pressure of the foot on the poison-bag. Many cases are on record in which such wounds have been fatal.

sŷn-ŷn'-ŷid-ŷ-ŷm, s. [Mod. Lat., synanceia (eis), and Gr. εἶδος (eidōs) = form.]

Ichthy.: A genus of Scorpenidae, allied to Synanceia (q.v.); from tropical seas.

sŷn-ŷn'-ŷthŷr-ŷs, s. pl. [Mod. Lat., from pref. sŷn-, and ἄνθος (anthōs) = blooming.] [ANTHER.]

Bot.: The Composite (q.v.).

sŷn-ŷn'-ŷthŷr-ŷl-ŷ-ŷg-ŷt, s. [Eng. synanthology (y); -ist.] One who studies or discourses on synanthorous flowers.

"Facile princeps among synanthologistis."—Journal of Botany, vol. x., No. 221, p. 150.

sŷn-ŷn'-ŷthŷr-ŷl-ŷ-ŷg-ŷy, s. [Mod. Lat. synanthra, and Gr. λόγος (logos) = a word, a discourse.] A treatise on or a description of synanthorous flowers.

sŷn-ŷn'-ŷthŷr-ŷs, a. [SYNANTHERŷ.]

Bot.: Having the anthers growing together; anagennations.

sŷn-ŷn'-ŷthŷs, a. [Pref. sŷn-, and Gr. ἄνθος (anthos) = a flower, bloom.]

Bot. (Of a plant): The term used when flower and leaves appear at the same time.

sŷn-ŷn'-ŷthŷrŷs, s. [Mod. Lat. synanthra (q.v.); suff. -ose.]

Chem.: C12H22O11. A variety of sugar found in the tubercles of the Jerusalem artichoke, dahlia, &c. It is amorphous, deliquescent, soluble in water and alcohol, the solution being faintly sweet, and turns brown when heated to 140°, yielding caramel.

sŷn-ŷn'-ŷthŷ, s. [SYNANTHOUS.]

Bot.: The adhesion of several flowers.

sŷn-ŷph-ŷ-ŷ-brŷn'-ŷchŷs, s. [Gr. συνάφεια (synapeia) = combination, connection, and βράχια (branchia) = gills.]

Ichthy.: A genus of Murŷnidae, with four species. They are deep-sea congers, universally distributed, occurring at depths of from about 400 to 2,000 fathoms. Gill-openings ventral; pectorals and vertical well developed; nostrils lateral, mouth-cleft wide, teeth small body scaly; stomach extremely diatenaihle.

sŷn-ŷp'-ŷtŷ, s. [Gr. συναπτός (synaptos) = fastened together, continuous.]

Zool. & Paleont.: A genus of Holothuroidea, belonging to the order Apoda, or to the family Synaptidae (q.v.). The body is vermiform or slug-shaped, and the calcareous matter secreted by the integument is reduced to scattered spicules. Calcareous spicules from the Carboniferous strata, and from Secondary and Tertiary deposits have been referred to this genus.

sŷn-ŷp'-ŷtŷs, s. [SYNAPTA.] [EMULSIN.]

sŷn-ŷp'-ŷtŷc-ŷ-u-lŷs, s. pl. [Mod. Lat., from Gr. συναπτός (synaptos) = fastened together.]

Zool.: Transverse calcareous bars which stretch across the interseptal loculi in the Fungida, and form a kind of trellis-work, uniting the opposite faces of adjacent septa.

sŷn-ŷp'-ŷtŷ-dŷs, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. synapt(a); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -idŷc.]

Zool.: A family of the Holothuridan sub-order Apneumonia. No respiratory tree; ambulacral tube-feet wanting. [SYNAPTA.]

sŷn-ŷp'-ŷtŷr-ŷ, s. [Gr. συναπτός (synaptos) = continuous, and οὐρά (oura) = a tail.]

Ichthy.: A genus of Pleuronectidae (q.v.), with eighteen species from the Indian Ocean, and two from the Mediterranean and the coast of Portugal. Eyes on the right side, the upper in advance of the lower; mouth-cleft narrow; vertical fins confluent; lateral line straight.

*sŷn-ŷr-ŷchŷy, s. [Gr. συναρχία (sunarchia), from sŷn (sun) = together, and ἀρχή (archē) = rule.] Joint rule, joint sovereignty.

"The synarchies or joint reigns of father and son have rendered the chronology a little difficult."—Stackhouse: Hist. of the Bible.

sŷn-cra-tŷsm, s. [SYNCRETISM.]

sŷn-crŷ-tŷc, a. & s. [SYNCRETISM.]

A. As adj.: Of or pertaining to syncretism; characterized by syncretism.

B. As subst.: A syncretist (q.v.).

sŷn-crŷ-tŷsm, s. [Low Lat. syncretismus, from Ger. synkretismus, from Gr. συνκρητισμός (synkretismos), a word occurring only in Plutarch (vii. 910, ed. Reiske), and defined there as coined by the Cretans to denote their custom of uniting against a common foe, though they continually quarrelled amongst themselves. The verb συνκρητίζω (synkretízō) was used in an analogous sense by Erasmus (Corp. Ref., I. 77) in writing to Melancthon on April 22, 1519. (Herzog.)]

Church Hist.: A word introduced from the writings of the German Reformers, who, however much they varied amongst themselves, were unanimous on at least one subject—opposition to the Roman Church. The word passed through three distinct phases of meaning:

(1) A union between the Lutheran and Reformed Churches on the basis of common tenets.

(2) A union between Roman Catholics and Protestants on the basis of fundamental articles of belief.

(3) The principle of moderation, expansion, and development in Lutheran theology, as opposed to a rigid orthodoxy.

Blunt (Dict. Doct. & Hist. Theol., p. 725) says that "the term may be held to apply to any well-meaning but weak attempt to combine in one system opposite and contradictory theological opinions." [SYNCRETISTIC-CONTRO-VERSIV.]

"True, it is now rid of one of the most objectionable features of the original foundation, that syncretism with Lutheranism which was the chalking of a living body to a corpse."—Church Times, Feb. 26, 1887.

sŷn-crŷ-tŷst, s. [SYNCRETISM.]

Church Hist.: An advocate of any kind of Syncretism (q.v.); specif. applied to the followers and supporters of Calixtus. [SYNCRETISTIC-CONTRO-VERSIV.]

"He was violently attacked by the two opposite parties, the Romanist calling him Calvinist, the Lutheran reviling him as a Papist, and both parties agreed in corrupting the term Syncretist into 'Sünde-Christ,' 'sin-Christian.'"—Blunt: Dict. Doct. & Hist. Theol., p. 725.

sŷn-crŷ-tŷst'-ŷc, a. [Eng. syncretist; -ic.] Of or pertaining to Syncretism or the Syncretists.

syncretistic-controversy, s.

Church Hist.: The name given to a series of controversies which arose in the Lutheran Church in the seventeenth century, from the subject of the discussion—the promotion of fellowship and union between the Protestant churches of Germany. These controversies may be grouped into three periods:

1. From the Colloquy of Thorn (1645), in which it was sought to force a new confession of faith on the Lutheran Church, to the death of Calixtus (1656). George Calixtus was a professor of theology at Helmstadt, and his scheme of union was founded on the following propositions: (1) That the fundamental principles of Christianity were maintained pure in the Roman, Lutheran, and Reformed Churches. (2) That the tenets and opinions which had been constantly received by the ancient doctors during the first five centuries were to be considered as of equal truth and authority with the express declarations and doctrines of scripture. (3) That the churches which received these points, and held the additional tenets of the particular churches as non-essential, should come into peaceful relations, and thus pave the way for a future union. After the death of Calixtus, there was a period of peace for about five years.

2. From 1661-9. The conflict was renewed by the wish of the Landgrave of Hesse-Cassel, William VI., to secure a religious constitution broad enough to embrace both the Lutheran and Reformed Churches. The second attempt to have the Consensus adopted, which implicitly condemned Calixtus and his adherents as non-Lutheran and heretical, was a failure, and the subject was abandoned for a time.

3. In 1675, Calovius, professor of divinity at Wittenberg, reopened the controversy, and compelled the University of Jena to disavow all sympathy with the views of Calixtus. The death of Calovius in 1686 put an end to the dispute.

In the University of Cambridge syndics are chosen from the senate to transact special business, as the regulation of fees, the operations of the Clarendon Press, &c.

"May it please you, that Dr. Gunning and Dr. Pearson may be your legal syndics, for you and in your name, to treat and conclude with the said Archbishop concerning his and your right and interest in the said books."—Grace in the Senate, Cambridge, July, 1622.

syn-di-cate, s. [Eng. syndic; -ate.]

1. A body of syndics; a council; the office, position, or state of a syndic.

2. An association of persons formed for the purpose of promoting some particular enterprise, undertaking, or speculation, or of discharging some trust.

¶ Within recent years the tendency of capitalists to form syndicates, either for the performance of great public works, or for the control of manufacturing industries, has grown enormously, the latter form of syndicate being now usually known as a trust. One of the first of these to attract attention was the Standard Oil Trust, which virtually controls the production and handling of petroleum. The Sugar Trust, and trusts in almost every department of industry, have followed.

syn-di-cate, v.t.

1. To form into a syndicate

2. To handle or control by a syndicate.

*3. To judge, to censure.

Rhet.: The interjunction of words in uttering the clauses of sentences.

syn-ēr'-ē-sis, s. [SYNERESIS.]

syn-ēr-gēt'-ic, a. [Gr. συνεργητικός (sunergetikos).] [SYNERGIST.] Working together; cooperating.

syn-ēr-gism, s. [SYNERGIST.]

Church Hist.: A type of Semipelagianism which came into prominence in Germany in the sixteenth century, and which had for its chief representatives Erasmus and Melancthon. Luther taught that the Fall rendered Man incapable of all good, and powerless to contribute anything to his conversion. Synergism, on the other hand, taught that "God does not deal with man as with a block, but draws him so that his will cooperates;" and this view was adopted in the Leipzig Interim (1548). A controversy arose on the subject.

syn-ēr-gist, s. & a. [Fr. synergiste, from Gr. συνεργω (suergeō) = to work together: σύν (sun) = together, and έργον (ergon) = work.]

A. As subst.: A supporter of Synergism (q.v.); a Semipelagian.

"The strenuous Lutherans . . . violently assailed the persons whom they designated Synergists."—Moham: Eccles. Hist. (ed. Reidy), p. 650.

B. As adj.: Synergistic (q.v.).

"The problem took a new form in the Synergist controversy, which discussed the nature of the first impulse in conversion."—Encyc. Brit. (ed. 9th), xv. 28.

syn-ēr-gist'-ic, syn-ēr-gist'-ic-al, a. [Eng. synergist; -ic, -ical.]

1. Working together; cooperating.

2. Of or relating to the Synergists or their doctrine.

synergistic-controversy, s. [SYNERGISM.]

syn-ēr-gūs, s. [Gr. συνεργός (suergeos) = working together with.] [SYNERGIST.]

Entom.: A genus of Cynipidae. Synergus vulgaris has the mouth, antennae, and legs red. It breeds in cuckoo fashion, in the galls produced by Cynips quercus foliæ, ultimately devouring its larvæ.

syn-ēr-gŷ, s. [SYNERGIST.] A correlation or concurrence of action between different organs in health, and, according to some, in disease.

syn-ē-thēr-ēs, s. [Gr. συνήθης (sunethēs) = dwelling together.]

Zool.: The type-genus of Syntherina (q.v.), with eight or ten species from tropical America. They have only four toes on the hind feet, but, in place of the hallux, there is a fleshy pad between which and the toes the animal can grasp objects with tenacity.

syn-ē-thēr-i'-na, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. syntheres (-es); Lat. neut. pl. adj. suff. -ina.]

Zool.: New-world Porcupines, Tree-porcupines; a group of Hystericidae, with three genera, Erethizon, Syntheres, and Chatomys. They have rooted molars, complete collar-bones, tuberculate soles, and four mammae; the upper lip is unclenl, and there is no trace of a pollex. The spines are largely mixed with long, soft hair, and the tail is long and prehensile.

syngo, v.t. & t. [SING.]

syn-gē-nē-si'-a, s. pl. [Mod. Lat., from pref. -syn-, and Gr. γενεσις (genesis) = birth, generation.]

Bot.: The nineteenth order in Linnaeus's artificial classification. The anthers, and more rarely the filaments, are united into a cylinder or tube. It contained the Compositæ, &c., and was divided into the orders Polygamia Equalia, Polygamia Superiora, Polygamia Frustranea, Polygamia Necessaria, Polygamia Segregata, and Monogamia.

syn-gēn-ē-si'-ōūs, syn-gēn-ē-si'-an, a. [SYNGENESIA.]

Bot.: Having the anthers united by their margins into a tube, as in the Compositæ, in the violet, the balsam, &c.; of or belonging to the class Syngenesia (q.v.).

syn-gēn-ē-sis, s. [SYNGENESIA.]

Biol.: (See extract.)

"The theory of Syngenesia, which considers the embryo to be the product of both male and female, is as old as Empedocles, though it had no better basis than the observed resemblance between the offspring and both parents. Modern research has furnished a scientific basis by showing that, while in the higher animals both ova and spermatozoa are equally indispensable, they are themselves only modifications of and the same anatomical element."—Leaves: Aristotele, p. 233.

bōl, bōy; pōit, jōwī; cat, cell, chorus, çhin, bench; go, gem; thin, this; sin, as; expect, Xenophon, exist. -iŷg, -cian, -tian = shan. -tion, -sion = shūn. -cious, -tious, -sious = shūs. -ble, -dle, &c. = bēl, dēl.

syn-gē-nēt'-ic, a. [SYNOGENESIS.] Of or belonging to Syngenesia (q.v.).

"The Syngenetic theory—which makes both parents equally progenitors."—Lewes: Aristotle, p. 351.

syn-gēn-ite, s. [Gr. συγγενής (synggenēs) = related; and -ite (Mfin.),] Min.: A monoclinic mineral, occurring in small tabular crystals in rock salt at Kalisz, Galicia. Hardness, 2.5; sp. gr. 2.603. Compo.: a hydrated sulphate of potash and lime, the formula being, CaOSO₃.KOSO₃ = HO.

syn-gnā-thī-dæ (g silent), s. pl. [Mod. Lat. syn-gnath(us); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -idæ.]

Ichthy.: Pipe-fishes; a family of Lophobranchii; gill-openings reduced to a very small opening near the upper posterior angle of the gill; one soft dorsal fin; ventrals, and sometimes one or more of the other fins, absent. They are small marine fishes, abundant on the coasts of the tropical and temperate zones where the marine vegetation is thick enough to offer them shelter. All the species enter brackish, and some fresh water. There are two groups: Hippocampina and Syngnathina (q.v.).

2. Paleont.: From the Eocene of Monte Bolca, and the Miocene of Licata, in Sicily.

syn-gnā-thī-na (g silent), a. pl. [Mod. Lat. syngnath(us); Lat. neut. pl. adj. suff. -ina.]

Ichthy.: A group of Syngnathida (q.v.), with several genera. The tail is not prehensile, and a caudal fin is generally present.

syn-gnā-thois (g silent), a. [SYNONATHUS.] Of, belonging to, or characteristic of the Syngnathida.

"The males of existing syngnathous fishes receive the eggs of the females in their abdominal pouches."—Darwin: Descent of Man (ed. 2nd), p. 163.

syn-gnā-thūs (g silent), s. [Gr. σύν (sun) = together, and γνάθος (gnathos) = the jaw. Named from the fact that the maxillaries are produced into a tubular snout.]

Ichthy.: Pipe-fish (q.v.); the type-genus of Syngnathida, with about fifty species; its distribution nearly coincides with that of the family. Body with the ridges more or less distinct; pectorals well-developed, caudal-fin present; dorsal opposite or near the seat; egg-pouch as in Siphonostoma (q.v.).

syn-graph, s. [Fr. syngraphe, from Lat. syngrapha; Gr. συγγραφή (synggraphē), from σύν (sun) = with, together, and γράφω (graphō) = to write.] A writing signed by both or all the parties to a contract or bond.

"The syngraphs and original subscriptions of divers Eastern Patriarchs."—Evelyn: Diary, Oct. 29, 1662.

syn-i-zē-sis, s. [Gr., from συνίζω (synizō) = to sit with or together; σύν (sun) = with, together, and ίζω (hizō) = to sit.]

1. Gram.: The contraction of two syllables, or two vowels, into one; synepheothesis.

2. Pathol.: Blindness caused by an obstruction, or by a contraction of the pupil.

syn-neu-rō-sis, s. [Or. σύν (sun) = together, and νεῦρον (neuron) = a nerve, a sinew.]

Anat.: The connection of parts by means of ligaments, as in the movable joints.

syn-ō-cha, s. [Mod. Lat., from Gr. συναχῆ (synachē) = a holding together; συνέχω (synēcho) = to hold together.] [SYNCHÆIA.]

Pathol.: Relapsing fever (q.v.).

syn-ō-chal, a. [Eng. synoch(a); -al.]

Med.: Pertaining or relating to synocha.

syn-ō-chōr'-i-ōn, s. [Pref. syn-; o connect., and Gr. χοῖρον, χοῖριον (chōrion) = skin, leather.]

Bot.: Mirbel's name for a Carcerula (q.v.).

syn-ō-chūs, s. [SYNOCHA.]

Pathol.: A continued fever, combined of synocha and typhus, and in its commencement much resembling the latter. (Dunglison.)

syn-ōc-rē-ate, † syn-ōch-rē-ate, a. [Pref. syn-, and Eng. ochreate (q.v.).]

Bot.: Having the stipules united into a sheath.

syn-ōd, s. [Fr. synode, from Lat. synodum, accus. of synodus; Gr. σύνδος (synodos) = a meeting; σύν (sun) = with, together, and ὁδός (hodos) = a way, hence, a coming.]

I. Ordinary Language:

* 1. A meeting or convention, as of a legislative assembly; a council.

"It hath in solemn synods been decreed, Both by the Synodians and ourselves."—Shaksp.: Comedy of Errors, 1. 1.

* 2. A conjunction of two or more of the heavenly bodies.

"Their planetary motions and aspects . . . Of noxious efficacy, and when to join In synod no benign."—Milton: P. L., x. 661.

II. Eccles.

A meeting or assembly of ecclesiastical persons for mutual deliberation on matters of difficulty or of general interest affecting the churches over which they rule, and designed for their guidance. In the early Church there were four kinds of synod. First, an Ecumenical, that is, a General or Universal Synod, commonly called a General Council [COUNCIL]; second, a National Synod, attended by the clergy of one nation only; third, a Provincial Synod, attended by the clergy of a province [Convocation (q.v.) is of this type]; and, fourth, a Diocesan Synod, attended by the clergy of a single diocese. Among the Presbyterians a synod is a "court" intermediate between the General Assembly and a Presbytery, or, if no Assembly exist, it is then itself the highest court. It is divided into Presbyteries, of which there are never less than three. Each congregation is represented by a minister and an elder.

Synod of Dort:

Church Hist.: A synod held at Dort, Dordt, or Dordrecht, in Southern Holland, in 1618 and 1619, to discuss the views of Arminius, which it condemned. [ARMINIAN.]

synod-man, s. A member of a Church synod.

"He has abnūd' our church. . . . Despled our synod-men like dirt, And made their discipline his sport."—Burter: Hudibras, pt. II, c. III.

syn-ōd-al, *sin-od-all, *syn-od-all, a. & s. [Eng. synod; -al.]

A. As adj.: Of or pertaining to a synod or synods; done in or by a synod; synodic; of the nature of a synod.

"The synodical assemblies by the bishops or commissioners."—Hollinshed: Hist. Scot. (an. 1583).

B. As substantive (Pl.):

* 1. A name sometimes given to constitutions made in provincial or diocesan synods.

2. Payments formerly made by the parochial clergy to the bishop in honour of the episcopal chair, and in token of subjection and obedience. These charges were transferred to the ecclesiastical commissioners, who claim them through the archdeacons when the latter go their rounds.

* syn-ō-dī-an, s. [Eng. synod; -ian.] A synod-man.

syn-ōd'-ic, syn-ōd'-ic-al, *syn-od-ic-al, a. [Gr. συνωδικός (synōdikos), from σύνδος (synodos) = a synod (q.v.); Fr. synodique.]

I. Ord. Lang.: Of or pertaining to a synod; transacted in a synod; made in or by a synod.

"It could not stand with their conscience to promise obedience to all synodical decrees."—Hales: Remains; Let. from the Synod of Dort, Jan., 1618.

II. Astron.

Of or pertaining to a conjunction between two heavenly bodies, or specially to the time intervening between them, extending from one conjunction to the next.

"The moon makes its synodical motion about the earth in 29 days, 12 hours, and about 44 minutes."—Locke: Natural Philosophy, ch. XIII.

synodie-month, s.

Astron.: The period between two successive conjunctions of the sun and moon. It is 29 days, 12 hours, 44 minutes, 2.37 seconds. Called also Lunation and Lunar Month.

synodical-revolution, s.

Astron.: The period which elapses between two successive conjunctions of a planet with the sun.

* syn-ōd'-ic-al-ly, adv. [Eng. synodical; -ly.]

1. By the authority of a synod or public assembly.

"Which sentence passed by the major part of voices, and was synodically concluded."—Hales: Remains; Lett. from Synod of Dort, Dec., 1618.

2. In a synod.

"Dionysius, Bishop of Rome, in a letter [wrote very probably with the advice and consent of his clergy synodically convened]."—Waterland: Works, II., ser. 3.

* syn-ō-dist, s. [Eng. synod; -ist.] One who adheres to a synod.

syn-ō-dōn'-tis, s. [Pref. syn-, and Gr. ὀδώντος (odonōtos) = a tooth.]

Ichthy.: A genus of Silurida Stenobranchia, group Doradina, with fifteen species, characteristic of tropical Africa. Adipose fin moderate or long, dorsal with very strong spine, and seven soft rays; teeth in lower jaw movable, long, very thin at base; month small, barbels six, more or less fringed; neck with broad dorsal bones.

syn-ōs-cious, a. [Gr. συνουσία (synoukia) = a living or dwelling together.] [SYNGEUM.]

Bot.: Having male and female flowers on the same head. Opposed to monoecious and dioecious (q.v.).

syn-ōs'-ci-ūm, s. [Mod. Lat., from Gr. σύνωκος (synokos) = a living together; σύν (sun) = together, and οἶκος (oikos) = to dwell.]

Zool.: A genus of Botryllida, with one species, from the Arctic Seas. Animals semi-cartilaginous, cylindrical, stalked, solitary, or gregarious; systems circular, terminal tunics six to nine in a group, apertures six-rayed.

syn-ō-mō-sy, s. [Gr. συνωμοσία (synōmosia), from σύν (sun) = together, and ὄμιμα (omima) = to swear.] Sworn brotherhood; a society in ancient Greece nearly resembling a modern political club.

syn-ō-nym, syn-o-nyme, *syn-ōn'-i-ma, s. [Fr. synonyme, from Lat. synonyma, neut. pl. of synonymus; Gr. συνώνυμος (synōnymos) = of like meaning; σύν (sun) = with, and ὄνομα (onoma) = a name.]

1. Ord. Lang.: A word having the same, or nearly the same, meaning as another. Properly a synonym is a word which is the precise equivalent of, or is identical in meaning with, another word of the same language and of the same grammatical class. The term is, however, used with considerable latitude, so as to include words sufficiently alike in general signification to be liable to be confounded, but yet so different in special definition as to require to be distinguished. (Marsh.)

"It is scarcely useful to remind the reader that the word synonym is, in fact, a misnomer, as applied to words of the description in question. Literally, it implies an exact coincidence of meaning in two or more words; in which case there would be no room for discussion; but it is generally applied to words which would be more correctly termed pseudo-synonyms—i. e., words having a shade of difference, yet with a sufficient resemblance of meaning to make them liable to be confounded together."—Trench: English Synonyms. (Pref.)

2. Nat. Science.: A name applied to any group, genus, or species by any author other than the original discoverer or describer, to whom the right of naming belongs. Synonyms should be arranged in strict chronological order, the name of the author being appended to each, with the date at which the name was published and the publication in which it first appeared.

Synonyms . . . are a stumbling-block and an impediment in all branches of natural history."—Woodward: Mollusca (ed. Traill), p. 48.

* syn-nōn'-y-mal, a. [Eng. synonym; -al.] Synonymous.

"Repetitions here . . . and enlargements by synonymal words, before the shutting up of the period."—Instruct. for Oratory (1682), p. 95.

* syn-nōn'-y-mal-ly, *syn-nōn'-i-mal-ly, adv. [Eng. synonymal; -ly.] As synonyms; synonymously.

"The fifth canon either useth them synonymally, or plainness of one abuse in the preamble, and pro vith against another in the decree."—Speelman: De Sepultura.

syn-o-nyme, s. [SYNONYM.]

syn-ō-nym'-ic, a. [Eng. synonym; -ic.]

* 1. The same as SYNONYMUS (q.v.).

2. Of or pertaining to the different names used by various authors for the same group, genus, or species.

"The name used by Doubleday in his synonymic lists of British Lepidoptera."—Stainton: British Butterflies, II. 447.

* syn-ō-nym'-ic-al, a. [Eng. synonym; -ical.] The same as SYNONYMUS (q.v.).

"We are glad to find all synonymical lists omitted."—Athenæum, Sept. 5, 1885, s. 207.

* syn-ō-nym'-ic-ōn, a. [SYNONYMIC.] A dictionary of synonyms or synonymous words.

fāte, fāt, fāre, amidst, whāt, fāll, father; wē, wēt, hēre, camēl, hēr, hēr, thēr; pine, pīt, sire, sir, marine; gō, pōt, or, wōre, wōlf, wōrk, whō, sōn; mūte, cūb, cūre, unīte, cūr, rūle, fūll; trȳ, Sȳrian. æ, œ = ē; ey = ā; qu = kw.

* sýn-ô-ným'-i-ôs, s. [SYNONYMIC.] The science or the scientific treatment of synonymous words.

sý-nôn'-ý-míst, s. [Eng. synonymy; -ist.] 1. Ord. Lang.: One who collects or explains synonyms. 2. Nat. Hist.: One who collects synonymic names and arranges them in order.

sýn-ô-ným'-i-tý, s. [Eng. synonymy; -ity.] The state of being synonymous with; synonymy. "The Germanic origin of his name, and its synonymy with Shakespeare."—Notes & Queries, July 19, 1884, p. 43.

sý-nôn'-ý-míze, v.t. [Eng. synonymy; -ize.] To express by synonyms or words of the same meaning; to express the meaning of by a synonym.

"Likewise this word 'fortis' we may synonymize after all these fashions, stout, hardy, valiant, doughty, courageous, adventurous, &c."—Camden's Remains; Of the English Tongue.

sý-nôn'-ý-moús, a. [Lat. synonymus; Gr. συνώνυμος (synónymos)] [SYNONYM.] Having the nature or character of a synonym; expressing the same thing by different terms; conveying the same idea.

"I have observed in a former place that will and pleasure are reputed synonymous terms."—Search: Light of Nature, vol. 1, pt. 1, ch. vi.

sý-nôn'-ý-moús-ly, adv. [Eng. synonymy; -ly.] In a synonymous manner; in the same sense; with the same meaning.

"According to that larger notion of the word as taken synonymously with avroyeves."—Cudworth: Intell. System, p. 255.

sý-nôn'-ý-mý, s. [Lat. synonymia, from Gr. συνωνυμία (synónymia) = likeness of names.] [SYNONYM.]

I. Ordinary Language: 1. The quality of being synonymous or of expressing the same meaning by different words.

* 2. A thing of the same name. "We have three rivers of note synonymous with her."—Drayton: Poly-Obbion, s. 2. (Illust.)

3. A system of synonyms.

II. Rhet.: A figure by which synonymous words are used to amplify a discourse.

sýn-ô-phý-tý, s. [Pref. syn-; o connect., and Gr. φύτον (phuton) = a plant.] Bot.: The adhesion of several embryos.

sýn-ôp'-sís (pl. sý-nôp'-sés), sin-op-sis, s. [Lat. synopsis, from Gr. σύνopsis (synopsis) = a seeing all together; σύν (sun) = together, and ὄψις (opsis) = a sight.] A general view of the subject; a view of the whole or of all the parts at once; a kind of summary or brief statement giving a general view of some subject; a collection of heads or short paragraphs arranged so as to exhibit the whole in a general view; a conspectus.

"I shall here draw up a short synopsis of this epistle."—Warburton: Comment on Essay on Man.

sýn-ôp'-tío, a. & s. [Gr. συνοπτικός (synopτικός) = seeing all together.] [SYNOPSIS.]

A. As adj.: Of the nature of a synopsis; affording a synopsis or general view of the whole or principal parts of a thing at once.

B. As subst.: One of the Synoptic gospels (q.v.).

Synoptic-gospels, s. pl. Biblical Criticism: The first three Gospels, Matthew, Mark, and Luke, which regard events from the same point of view, and present close resemblances to each other. Four hypotheses have been framed to account for the correspondences: (1) That the Synoptic Gospels were derived from a common written source or sources; (2) That the earlier gospels were consulted in the composition of the later ones; (3) That all the three were derived from oral tradition; or (4) That they were all derived partly from oral tradition, but that the second was also copied from the first, and the third from the first and second. The Synoptic-gospels treat of the humanity rather than the divinity of Jesus, though not in any way ignoring the latter. [GOSPEL II. 2.]

sýn-ôp'-tío-al, a. [Eng. synoptic; -al.] The same as SYNOPTIC (q.v.).

"So many synoptical tables, calculated for his monthly use."— Evelyn: Kalendarium.

sýn-ôp'-tío-al-ly, adv. [Eng. synoptical;

-ly.] In a synoptical manner; so as to afford a synopsis of anything.

"I shall more synoptically here insert a catalogue of all dying materials."—Spratt: History of the Royal Society, p. 298.

sýn-ôp'-tíst, s. [Eng. synoptical; -ist.] One of the writers of the Synoptic Gospels; Matthew, Mark, or Luke.

sýn-ô-rhî-zoús, a. [Pref. syn-; o connect., and Gr. ῥίζα (rhiza) = a root.] Bot.: Having a radicle, the point of which is united to the albumen.

sýn-ô-s-tê-ôg-ra-phý, s. [Pref. syn-, and Eng. osteography.] Anat.: A description of the joints of the body.

sýn-ô-s-tê-ôl'-ô-gý, s. [Pref. syn-, and Eng. osteology (q.v.).] Anat.: A treatise upon the joints of the body.

sýn-ô-s-tê-ô-tôme, s. [Pref. syn-, and Eng. osteotome.] Surg.: A dismembering knife.

sýn-ô-s-tê-ôt'-ô-mý, s. [Pref. syn-, and Eng. osteotomy.] Surg.: Dissection of the joints.

sýn-ô-s-tê-sis, s. [Pref. syn-, and Gr. στέρον (osteron) = a bone.] Anat.: Premature obliteration of certain sutures of the skull.

sýn-ô-tís, s. [Pref. syn-, and Gr. ὄτις (otis), genit. ὄτος (otos) = the ear.] Zool.: A genus of Plecoiti (q.v.). Inner margins of ears uniting on forehead slightly in front of the eyes; feet slender, with long toes. Two species, Synotus barbastellus, ranging from the south of England to the Crimea, and S. darjilingensis, from India.

sý-nô-vi'-a, s. [Gr. σύν (sun) = with, and ὄν (on); Lat. ovum = an egg.] Anat. & Chem.: Joint oil, a fluid by which the joints of animals are lubricated. It is viscid and transparent, is of a yellowish or faintly reddish tint, and a slightly saline taste. According to Frerichs, the synovia of the ox consists of 94.85 water, 0.56 mucus and cells, 0.07 fat, 3.51 albumen and extracted matter, and 0.99 salts.

sý-nô-vi'-a, s. [Gr. σύν (sun) = with, and ὄν (on); Lat. ovum = an egg.] Anat. & Chem.: Joint oil, a fluid by which the joints of animals are lubricated. It is viscid and transparent, is of a yellowish or faintly reddish tint, and a slightly saline taste. According to Frerichs, the synovia of the ox consists of 94.85 water, 0.56 mucus and cells, 0.07 fat, 3.51 albumen and extracted matter, and 0.99 salts.

sý-nô-vi'-a, s. [Gr. σύν (sun) = with, and ὄν (on); Lat. ovum = an egg.] Anat. & Chem.: Joint oil, a fluid by which the joints of animals are lubricated. It is viscid and transparent, is of a yellowish or faintly reddish tint, and a slightly saline taste. According to Frerichs, the synovia of the ox consists of 94.85 water, 0.56 mucus and cells, 0.07 fat, 3.51 albumen and extracted matter, and 0.99 salts.

sý-nô-vi'-a, s. [Gr. σύν (sun) = with, and ὄν (on); Lat. ovum = an egg.] Anat. & Chem.: Joint oil, a fluid by which the joints of animals are lubricated. It is viscid and transparent, is of a yellowish or faintly reddish tint, and a slightly saline taste. According to Frerichs, the synovia of the ox consists of 94.85 water, 0.56 mucus and cells, 0.07 fat, 3.51 albumen and extracted matter, and 0.99 salts.

sý-nô-vi'-al, a. [Eng. synovial (a); -al.] Pertaining to or consisting of synovia; secreting a lubricating fluid. There are synovial bursae, capsules, folds or fringes, membranes, sheaths, &c.

"The most serious kind of synovial enlargements."—Field, April 4, 1885.

synovial-membranes, s. pl. Anat.: Membranes resembling serous membranes, but lubricated by synovia. They surround the cavities of joints, besides existing in other directions, their function being to lessen friction and facilitate motion. They are placed in three classes: articular, vesicular, and vaginal.

synovial-rheumatism, s. Pathol.: Rheumatism specially affecting the synovial membranes covering the articular extremities of the bones, increasing the synovia in the closed synovial sacs. It chiefly affects the knee-joint, which has the largest synovial membrane in the body.

sýn-ô-vi'-tís, s. [Eng. synovial (a); suff. -itis.] Pathol.: Inflammation of the synovial membrane. It sometimes occurs in connection with scarlatina.

† sýn-sep'-a-loús, a. [Pref. syn-; Eng. sepal, and suff. -ous.] Bot.: Gamosepalous.

sýn-spêrm-ý, s. [Pref. syn-, and Gr. σπέρμα (sperma) = seed.] Bot.: Union of this seed. (Masters.)

* sýn-tác'-tío, * sýn-tác'-tío-al, a. [Gr. συντάκτος (synlokτος) = put in order.] [SYNTAX.]

I. Ord. Lang.: Conjoined; fitted to each other.

II. Gram.: Pertaining or according to the rules of syntax or grammatical construction. "A figure is divided into tropes, &c., grammatical, orthographic, syntactical."—Peuchan: Garden of Eloquence, bk. I.

* sýn-tác'-tío-al-ly, adv. [Eng. syntactical; -ly.] In a syntactical manner; in accordance with the rules of syntax; as regards syntax.

sýn-tág-ma-títe, s. [Gr. σύνταγμα (syn-tagma), genit. συντάγματος (syn-tagmatos) = arrangement, putting in order.] Min.: A name given by Breithaupt to the black hornblende of Monte Somma, Vesuvius.

sýn-ták, * sýn-ták'-is, * syn-taxe, s. [Lat. syn taxis; Gr. σύνταξις (syn taxis) = an arrangement; σύν (sun) = together, and τάξις (taxis) = order; τάσσω (tassō) = to arrange.]

* I. Ord. Lang.: Connected system or order; union of things.

"To the knowledge of the most contemptible effect in nature, it is necessary to know the whole synaxis of causes."—Gianini: Vanity of Dogmatizing, ch. xxii.

II. Gram.: That part of grammar which deals with the construction of sentences or the due arrangement of words or members of sentences in their mutual arrangements. It includes concord and government, and the order of words, or collocation.

"Who feed a pupil's intellect with store Of synaxis, truly, but with little more."—Cooper: Trocimus, 622.

sýn-téc'-tío, sýn-téc'-tío-al, a. [Gr. συντεκτικός (syn-tekτικός)] Pertaining or relating to syntexis (q.v.).

sýn-té-lef'-a, s. [Gr.] Greek Antiq.: An association of Athenian citizens, numbering five, six, or fifteen, who equipped a ship for the public service at their joint expense.

"Smaller proprietors were joined together in a kind of society, for which our language does not afford a special name, but which an Athenian would have called a synthesis; and each society was required to furnish, according to its means, a horse soldier or a foot soldier."—Maccaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. lii.

sýn-tér'-ê-sis, s. [Gr., from συντηρέω (syn-tereseō) = to watch closely; σύν (sun) = together, and τρέω (terēō) = to watch.]

* I. Ord. Lang.: Conscience regarded as the internal repository of the laws of right and wrong.

"On her a royal damsel still attends, And faithful counsellor synteresis."—Fletcher: Purple Island, vl.

2. Theraput.: Preservative or prophylactic treatment.

sýn-tê-rêt'-i-o, a. [Gr. συντηρητικός (syn-terêtikos)] Med.: Pertaining to synteresis; preserving health; prophylactic.

sýn-tê-thýs, s. [Pref. syn-, and Lat. tehya (q.v.).] Zool.: A genus of Clavineillide, with a single species, from Applecross Soand, Ross-shire. Animals compound, gelatinous, orbicular, sessile; individuals very prominent, arranged sub-concentrically in the common mass; branchial and atrial orifices simple. The individual ascidians are, when full-grown, two inches in length.

* sýn-têt'-i-o, a. [SYNTECTIC.]

sýn-têx'-is, a. [Gr., from συντέχω (syn-tekho) = to melt away.] Med.: A wasting of the body; a deep consumption.

sýn-thêr'-mal, a. [Pref. syn-, and Gr. θερμ (thermē) = heat.] Meteor., &c.: Having the same degree of heat.

sýn-thê-sis, s. [Lat., from Gr. σύνθεσις (synthesis) = a putting together; σύν (sun) = together, and θεσις (thesis) = a putting.] [TÆSIS.]

* I. Ord. Lang.: The act of joining or putting two or more things together; composition.

II. Technically:

1. Chem.: The building up of more or less complex bodies by the direct union of their elements, or of groups of elements. Thus, water can be produced synthetically by the union of two atoms of hydrogen with one atom of oxygen.

2. Logic: The method by composition, in opposition to the method of resolution or analysis. In synthesis, we reason from axioms, definitions, and already known principles, until we arrive at a desired conclusion. Of this nature are most of the processes of geometrical reasoning. In synthesis, we ascend from particular cases to general ones; in analysis, we descend from general cases to particulars.

"Each of the words Idea, In, Mind, involves a synthesis, and the proposition—Idea exist in mind, is a synthesis of synthesis. Passing from the assumption of idealism, to its argument, it might be shown that each of its syllogisms is a synthesis of synthesis; and that its conclusion, reached by putting together many syllogisms, is a synthesis of synthesis of synthesis. Instead, then, of the realistic belief being objectionable on the ground of its synthetic nature, its superiority is, that it is less open to this objection than any other belief which can be framed."—Herbert Spencer: Principles of Psychology.

3. Surg.: The operation by which divided parts are united.

*syn-thē-sise, v.t. [Eng. synthes(is); -ise.] To combine or bring together, as two or more things; to unite in one.

*syn-thē-sist, s. [Eng. synthes(is); -ist.] One who employs synthesis, or who follows synthetic methods.

syn-thēt-ic, syn-thēt-ic-al, a. [Gr. συνθετικός (synthetikós) = skilled in putting together; σύνθετος (synthētos) = one who puts together.] [SYNTHESIS.] Pertaining or relating to synthesis; consisting in or according to synthesis.

"The methods [he observes] of attaining a knowledge of nature, may be two; either the analytic or the synthetic. The first is proceeding from the causes to the effects. The second, from the effects to the cause."—Bacon: Posthumous Works, p. 333.

synthetic-types, s. pl.

Biol.: (See extract).

"Synthetic-types are those which combine in a well-balanced measure features of several types occurring as distinct, only at a later time. Saurid Fishes and Ichthyosaurs are more distinctly synthetic than prothetic types."—Agassiz: Classification, p. 178.

syn-thēt-ic-al-ly, adv. [Eng. synthetic; -ly.] In a synthetic manner; by synthesis; according to the rules of synthesis.

*syn-thēt-ize, v.t. [SYNTHETIC.] To unite in regular structure.

*syn-tō-mŷ, s. [Gr. συντομία (suntomia); σύντομος (suntomōs) = to cut short.] Brevity, conciseness.

syn-tōn-in, s. [Gr. συντομία (suntomia) = stretching; συν (sun) = together, and τινω (tino) = to stretch.]

Chem.: Muscle-fibrin. Liebig's name for a white, opaque, gelatinous substance, prepared by slightly heating muscle freed from blood with dilute hydrochloric acid, filtering, and precipitating with sodic carbonate. It is soluble in dilute hydrochloric acid and in feebly alkaline liquid, but insoluble in a solution of sodium chloride. A similar substance, giving all the reactions of syntonin, is obtained by treating egg albumen with dilute hydrochloric acid. [MUSCULIN.]

*syn-tō-si-ăst, s. [Gr. συν (sun) = with, together, and οσία (ousia) = existence.] One who holds the doctrine of consubstantiation. (Rogers: Thirty-Nine Articles, p. 283.)

syn-zŷg-ŷ-a, s. [Pref. syn-, and Gr. ζυγόν (zygon), ζυγός (zygós) = a yoke.]

Bot.: The point of junction of opposite cotyledons.

sŷ-phēr, s. [Etym. doubtful.] (See compound.)

sŷpher-joint, s.

Carp.: A lap joint for the edges of boards, leaving a flat or flush surface.

ŷ-phēr-īng, s. [SYPHER.]

Shipwright.: Lapping the chamfered edge of one plank over the similarly chamfered edge of another, so as to form a joint with a plane surface.

sŷ-phīl-ī-dēs, s. pl. [SYPHILIS.]

Pathol.: Skin affections of a syphilitic origin. They are usually copper-coloured rashes, scales, papules, pustules, crusts, ulcers, and cicatrices, and have been arranged in eight groups: vegetative, exanthematous, vesicular, squamous, papular, pustular, bulbous, and tubercular.

sŷph-ŷ-ŷ-ī-phō-bŷ-a, s. [Eng. syphilis, and Gr. φόβος (phobos) = fear.]

Pathol.: Syphilitic monomania; a morbid fear of being affected by syphilis, producing some imaginary symptoms of the disease, and often leading to suicide. The most obstinate cases are in women.

sŷph-ŷ-ŷ-ī-lis, s. [A word introduced by Sauvages from Syphilis, the name of a shepherd in Fracastoro's poem, Syphilis, sive Morbus Gallicus; Gr. σφύς (sŷs) = a hog, and φίλος (phīlos) = dear, loving. (Mahn.)]

Pathol.: A disease due to the introduction of a specific poison into the system by direct contact of an infected with a healthy surface. In the majority of cases syphilis is venereal; but it is by no means necessarily so, as the poison may be communicated to the fingers (as is often the case with medical men and midwives) from touching diseased parts, or it may be introduced by infected lymph in vaccination. It is characterized in the first instance by the presence of a single sore, the hard chancre, and frequently by induration of the absorbent glands, chiefly those of the groin. It has probably existed from time immemorial wherever promiscuous asexual intercourse has prevailed, though the statement is often made that it was first brought to Europe by the followers of Columbus. Mention of it occurs, however, in the ancient literature of China, and before the period above fixed, places called stews existed in the borough of Southwark, where prostitutes suffering from this contagious disease were confined. In the secondary or constitutional form, the throat is chiefly affected, frightful ulceration being common, with cutaneous eruptions, affections of the nose, ears, joints, and bones. Tertiary symptoms also occur, with the presence of nodes or gummata. In its constitutional form the fetus in utero, or newly-born infant is frequently affected.

sŷph-ŷ-ŷ-ī-lit-ic, a. [Eng. syphilis; -itic.] Pertaining to or of the nature of syphilis; as, syphilitic deafness, &c.; affected with or suffering from syphilis; useful in the cure of syphilis.

sŷph-ŷ-ŷ-ī-lī-zā-tion, s. [Eng. syphilis; -ation.]

Pathol.: Saturation of the system by inoculation with syphilitic virus. This method was introduced by M. Anzias Turenne in 1850.

"The system seemed to become protected, as in ordinary inoculation and vaccination, and a state of diathesis was produced, in which the body was no longer capable of being affected by syphilis; and the process by which this is accomplished is that to which the name syphilisation belongs."—Copland: Dict. Pract. Med. (ed. 1855), p. 1,463.

sŷph-ŷ-ŷ-ī-lize, v.t. [Eng. syphilis; -ize.] To saturate or inoculate with syphilitic matter as a cure for or a preventive against the disease.

sŷph-ŷ-ŷ-ī-lō-dēr-mā (pl. sŷph-ŷ-ŷ-ī-lō-dēr-mā-ta), s. [Eng. syphilis (q.v.), and Gr. δέρμα (derma) = skin.]

Pathol.: A skin disease produced by syphilis.

sŷph-ŷ-ŷ-ī-lōid, a. [Eng. syphilis; suff. -oid.] Resembling syphilis; having the character of syphilis.

sŷ-phīl-ō-mā (pl. sŷph-ŷ-ŷ-ī-lōm-ā-ta), s. [As if from a Greek word, but really a modern derivative from syphilis (q.v.).]

Pathol.: A tumour produced by syphilis. There are syphilomata of the lungs and of the heart. (Lanner.)

sŷ-phōn, s. [SIPHON.]

sŷ-phōn-ic, a. [SIPHONIC.]

† sŷ-phōn-ō-stōm-ā-ta, s. pl. [SIPHONOSTOMATA.]

sŷr-ēn (yr as ŷr), s. [SIREN.]

Sŷr-ŷ-ŷ-āc, a. & s. [Lat. Syriacus.]

A. As adj.: Of or pertaining to Syria or its language.

B. As subst.: The language spoken by the Syrians, especially the language of the ancient Syrians. It belongs to the Semitic family of languages, and differs little from the Chaldean or Eastern Aramaic.

Syriac-version, s.

Biblical Versions: Any version of the Bible in the Syriac language. The most important is the Peshito (q.v.); the next is the Philoxenian, or SYRO-PHILOXENIAN, made by Philoxenus, Bishop of Hierapolis (A.O. 488-518). It is confined to the New Testament.

Sŷr-ŷ-ŷ-ā-čism, a. [Eng. Syriac; -ism.] A Syriac idiom, phrase, or expression.

Sŷr-ŷ-ŷ-ān, a. & s. [See def.]

A. As adj.: Of or pertaining to Syria or its inhabitants; Syriac.

B. As subst.: A native or inhabitant of Syria.

Syrian-bear, s.

Zool.: Ursus syriacus, from Western Asia. It is about the size of the Brown Bear, but of a much lighter colour, varying from fulvous-brown to fulvous-white, according to the season of the year. The she-bears which came out of the wood, and "tare forty and two" of the mockers of Elisha (2 Kings ii. 23) were probably of this species, as no other is known to occur in the mountain-ranges of Syria.

Syrian-Catholic, s. pl.

Church Hist.: A term which should properly include all Christians using a Syriac liturgy, but confined by ecclesiastical writers to converts from the Jacobite or Monophysite Church in Syria.

Syrian Jacobites, s. pl.

Church Hist.: The members of the church that once pervaded Syria. The great body of them now reside near Mosul and Aleppo, in Mesopotamia, others are in or near Malindi. A large colony, now however much reduced by conversions to Roman Catholicism, exists in Malabar and Travancore in India. They call themselves Jacobites, nominally from the patriarch Jacob, really from Jacob Bardana, Bishop of Orfa (Edessa), who died in 558, and who was successful in reuniting the Monophysites. They use the Syriac language in their liturgy.

Syrian-ruo, s.

Bot.: Peganun Harmata.

Sŷr-ŷ-ŷ-ān-ism, s. [Eng. Syriac; -ism.] A Syriac idiom, phrase, or expression.

*Sŷr-ŷ-ŷ-ān-ism, s. [Eng. Syriac; -ism.] The same as SYRIANISM (q.v.).

"The Scripture Greek is observed to be full of Syriacisms and Hebraisms."—Warburton: Doctrines of Grace.

sŷ-rīn-gā, s. [Lat. syrinx; Gr. σφύριξ (sŷfirix) = a pipe. So called because the branches are long, straight, and with large pith.]

Botany:

1. A synonym of Philadelphus. [3.]

2. Lilia; a genus of Fraxineæ. Deciduous shrubs, with simple leaves, and very fragrant flowers in terminal thyrsoid panicles. Calyx small, four-toothed; corolla funnel-shaped, the limb four-parted; stamens two; stigma bifid; fruit a capsule, with two boat-shaped valves, having a dissepiment in the middle, two cells, and two seeds. Known species about six. Natives apparently of south-eastern Europe and central and eastern Asia. Syringa vulgaris is the Lilac (q.v.). S. persica is a smaller species or variety, with pinnatifid leaves, supposed to have come from Persia. There are three common varieties of it in nurseries, the White, the Cut-leaved, and the Sage-leaved Persian Lilac. S. josikera, a Transylvanian shrub, has scentless flowers. The leaves of S. euoides, a large Himalayan shrub, are eaten by goats.

3. (Pl.) The Philadelphaceæ (q.v.).

sŷr-ŷ-ŷ-īngē *sir-ŷngē, s. [Fr. syringe, from Lat. syringem, accens. of syrinx = a reed, pipe, tube; Gr. σφύριξ (sŷfirix) = a reed, a tube, a whistle; Sp. siringa; Ital. siringa.] A small portable hydraulic instrument of the pump kind, used to draw in a quantity of water or other liquid, and eject the same with force. In its simplest form it consists of a small cylindrical tube with an air-tight piston fitted with a rod and handle at the upper end. The lower end terminates in a small tapering tube. This being immersed in the fluid, the piston is drawn back, and the liquid is forced into the cylinder by atmospheric pressure. On pushing the piston back again to the lower end of the cylinder the liquid is ejected in a jet. The syringe is used by surgeons, &c., for washing wounds, injecting liquids into animal bodies and similar purposes. Larger forms are used for watering plants, trees, &c.

"The like device to this, namely, clyster, we learned first of a Jew in the same Egypt, which is called this for the black stork." This bird having a crooked and hooked bill, with it in stead of a syringe or pipe, to squirt water into that part, whereby it is most kind and holome to void the dung and excrements of turst, and so purgeth and cleareth her bodie."—P. Holland: Plinie, lib. viii. ch. xxvii.

† Pneumatic Syringe; [PNEUMATIC-SYRINGE.]

ŷto, ŷt, fare, amidst, whāt, fäll, father; wē, wēt, hère, camel, hēr, there; pine, pīt, sire, sir, marine; gō, pōt, or, wōre, wōlf, wōrk, wōh, sōn; mūte, cūb, cūre, unite, cūr, rūle, fūll; trŷ, Sŷrian. æ, œ = ē; ey = ā; qu = kw.

*syringe-engine, s. A machine on the principle of the syringe, formerly used as a fire-engine.

syringe-valve, s. A peculiarly constructed valve used in syringes. The valve-guide stem has an end knob, by which its falling out is prevented.

syr-inge, v.t. & i. [SYRINGE, s.]

A. Transitive:

1. To inject by means of a syringe.

"I syringed into a dog's jugular vein about two quarts of warm water."—Boyle: Works, vi. 464.

2. To wash or cleanse by injections from a syringe.

B. Intrans.: To inject water by means of a syringe.

syr-in-gô-dên-drôn, s. [Gr. σὺριγὴ (syringē), σὺριγγος (syringgos) = a pipe or tube, and δένδρον (dendron) = tree.]

Palæobot.: A genus of coal plants founded by Sternberg, and adopted by Brongnart. Trunk furrowed, with equal and parallel ribs. Some of the species included in it are now placed under Sigillaria.

syr-rin-gôp-ôr-a, s. pl. [Gr. σὺριγὴ (syringē), genit. σὺριγγος (syringgos) = a pipe, and πόρος (poros) = a passage; a pore.]

Palæont.: A genus of Halytitida. Corallum fasciculate, with cylindrical corallites united by horizontal connecting processes. Silurian to the Carboniferous.

syr-rin-gô-tô-ma, s. [Gr. σὺριγὴ (syringē), genit. σὺριγγος (syringgos) = a pipe, a fistula, and τομή (tomē) = a cutting.]

Surg.: A bistoury, concave on its edge, and terminated by a long, flexible, probe-pointed stylet. Formerly used for operations for fistula in ano.

syr-rin-gô-t-ô-mÿ, s. [Fr. syringotomie.] [SYRINGOTOME.]

Surg.: The operation or act of cutting for fistula.

syr-in-gô-x-ÿ-lôn, s. [Gr. σὺριγὴ (syringē), genit. σὺριγγος (syringgos) = a pipe, and ξύλον (xylon) = wood.]

Palæobot.: A genus of plants believed by its discoverer, Principal Dawson, to be angiospermous. Known species one, Syringoxylon mirabile, from the Devonian of New York.

syr-in-x, s. [Lat., from Gr. σὺριγὴ (syringē) = a pipe, a tube.]

1. Compar. Anat.: The inferior larynx, a modification of the trachea where it joins the bronchi. It is the organ of song in birds.

2. Music: The same as PANPIPE (q.v.).

3. Surg.: A fistula.

4. Zool.: A genus of Sipunculidæ. Proboscis shorter than the body; cylindrical, with a circle of short-fingered tentacles around the tip. Professor Edward Forbes described three British species.

syr-ma, s. [Gr., from σὺρω (suro) = to drag, to trail.]

Greek Antig.: A long dress, reaching to the ground, worn by tragic actors.

†syr-ni-î-nœa, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. syrni(um); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -i(n)æ.]

Ornith.: A sub-family of Bubonidæ, with three genera: Asio, Nyctala, and Syrnium (q.v.).

syr-ni-um, s. [Etym. doubtful.]

Ornith.: A genus of Syrnina (q.v.). The type is Syrnium aluco, or Aluco jamaica, the Tawny Owl. [STRIX, 2.]

*syr-ôp, s. [SYROP.]

syr-phi-dæ, s. pl. [Lat. syrph(us); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -idæ.]

Entom.: A family of Diptera, tribe Athericera (having the antennæ of three joints, the apical one with a bristle). The Syrphidæ have the antennal bristle finely feathered; the eyes are large, meeting in the males; the ocelli three; proboscis generally short, the terminal lobes fleshy, enclosing three bristles; palpi small, with one joint; abdomen flattened, with five segments; tarsi with two pulvilli. Smooth or hairy insects, often seen hovering almost without motion over the flowers of Composites or other plants, some of them looking like bees, from which they may at once be distinguished by their having only two wings, and being destitute of a sting. The species are numerous, and the larvæ diverse in habits. Most of the latter feed on the roots or bulbs of plants, or live in decaying wood, mud, or sewers, or in the water, or as parasites in the nests of wasps and humble bees, or crawling over plants in quest of Aphides. Genera more than forty, and among them Syrphus, Volucella, Eristalis, Helophilus, &c.

syr-phus, s. [Gr. σέρφος (serphos), σέρφος (serphos) = a small-winged insect, perhaps a gnat or an ant.]

Entom.: The typical genus of Syrphidæ (q.v.). The larvæ feed on aphides. Among the species of this genus one of the most common is Syrphus pyrastris, a bine-black fly, with whitish or yellowish transverse bands on the abdomen, black thighs, and yellowish legs. It is sometimes mistaken for a wasp. The larvæ is a footless grub, living on plants infested by aphides.

syr-rhâp-tôs, s. [Gr. συρραπτός (surrhapτός) = sewn together; συρραπώ (surrhapō) = to sew together; σύν (sun) = together, and ράπτω (rhapō) = to sew.]

Ornith.: A genus of Pteroclidæ (q.v.), with two species. Bill small, conical, nostrils concealed by feathers, tarsi hirsute; toes short, concrete, hirsute above, hallux absent; the two middle tail-feathers and first two quills of wings produced into pointed setaceous filaments. They normally range from Tartary, Thibet, and Mongolia, to the country round Pekin, and occasionally visit Eastern Europe; and in 1868 great numbers of them appeared in Europe, and reached westward to the shores of the Atlantic.

*syr-t, s. [Fr. syrt, from Lat. sirtis; Gr. σὺρτις (surtis) = a sandbank.] [SYRTIS.] A quicksand.

*syr-tic, a. [Eng. syrt; -ic.] Pertaining or relating to a syrt or quicksand; of the nature of a quicksand.

syr-tis, s. [Lat., from Gr. σὺρτις (surtis), from σὺρω (suro) = to draw.]

1. Ord. Lang.: A quicksand. (Originally applied especially to two sandbanks on the north coast of Africa.)

"Quench'd in a boggy sirtis, neither sea, Nor good dry land." Milton: P. L., il. 989.

2. Entom.: A genus of Bugs, family Membranaceæ (q.v.), having the sides of the abdomen dilated. Two species, Syrtis crassipes and S. monstrosa, occur on the continent of Europe.

syr-ÿp, *sir-ôp, *sir-ÿp, *sir-rôp, s. [O. Fr. syrrop, ysserop (Fr. sirrop), from Sp. zarope = a medicinal drink, from Arab. sharâb, sharâb = wine or any beverage, syrrop, from shariba = he drank; Ital. siroppa.] [SRRUB (2), SHERRET.]

I. Ord. Lang.: A popular language, the uncrystallizable fluid finally separated from crystallized sugar in the process of refining, either by the draining of sugar in loaves, or by being forcibly ejected by the centrifugal apparatus in preparing moist sugar, commonly known as golden syrup. By sugar manufacturers the term syrup is applied to all strong saccharine solutions which contain sugar in a condition capable of being crystallized out, the ultimate uncrystallizable fluid being distinguished as molasses or treacle.

"The juice which trickles into these vessels is collected by persons who climb the trees for that purpose every individual upon the island; yet a much greater quantity is drawn off than is consumed in this use, and of the surplus they make both a syrup and coarse sugar."—Cook: First Voyage, bk. iii, ch. 12.

II. Technically:

1. Chem.: A saturated, or nearly saturated, solution of sugar in water.

2. Pharm.: Syrupus; a preparation in which sugar forms an important ingredient, and gives a peculiar consistence to the liquid. Its general use is to disguise the flavour of drugs; but in some cases, as in that of the iron iodide, the sugar preserves the active ingredient from undergoing chemical change. About seventeen syrups are used in modern pharmacy. Among them are Syrupus auranti, S. limonis, S. papaveris, S. senno, &c. [GARROD.]

"His drugs, his drinks, and syrups doth apply, To heat his blood and quicken luxury." Drayton: The Owl.

*syr-ÿped, *syr-ÿpt, a. [Eng. syrrop; -ed.] Sweetened by or as by moistening or mixing with syrup.

"Yet when there hops a honey fall, We'll lick the spruce leaves." Drayton: Quest of Cynthia.

syr-ÿp-ÿ, sir-ÿp-ÿ, a. [Eng. syrrop; -ÿ.] Like syrup; partaking of the nature or qualities of syrup.

"Apples are of a syrappy, tenacious nature."—Mortimer: Eusebius.

sÿs-sar-ô-sis, s. [Gr., from συσαρκῶς (susarkōs) = to unite by flesh; σὺ (su), for σύν (sun) = with, together, and σάρξ (sarx), genit. σαρκός (sarkos) = flesh.]

1. Anat.: A species of union of bones, in which one bone is united to another by means of an intervening muscle, as in the connection of the os hyoides to the sternum.

2. Surg.: The method of curing wounds by promoting the growth of new flesh.

sÿs-tâl-tic, a. [Lat. systalticus; Gr. συσταλτικός (sustaltikos) = drawing together; συτέλλω (sustellō) = to draw together; σύν (sun) = together, and στέλλω (stellō) = to set in order.]

Physiol.: Capable of or produced by alternate contraction and dilatation. Used spec. of the heart.

*sÿs-ta-sis, s. [Gr., from συνίστημι (sunistēmi) = to place together.] [SYSTEM.] A sitting together; a political union or constitution.

"It is a worse preservative of a general constitution than the system of Crete, or the confederation of Poland."—Burke: Reflections on the Revolution in France.

sÿs-tēm, *sÿs-tēme, s. [Lat. systema, from Gr. σύστημα (sustēma) = a complex whole put together, a system; συ (su), for σύν (sun) = with, together, and στη- (stē-), the base of ἵστημι (histēmi) = to stand; Fr. système; Sp. & Ital. sistema.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. A combination or assemblage of things adjusted into a regular and connected whole; a number of things or parts so connected and arranged as to make one complex thing; things connected according to a scheme; as a system of canals or railways, a system of forces acting upon a body.

2. An assemblage of parts or organs in an animal body which are composed of the same tissue or are essentially necessary to the performance of some function; as the nervous system, the vascular system, &c.

3. Hence applied to the body itself: as, To take nourishment into the system.

4. The whole scheme of creation regarded as forming one complete plan or whole; the universe.

5. A plan or scheme according to which things are connected or combined into a whole; an assemblage of facts, or of principles and conclusions scientifically arranged or disposed according to certain mutual relations, so as to form a complete whole; as, a system of philosophy, a system of government, &c.

6. Method, order, regularity; as, He has no system in his business.

7. Manner or way in which things are managed; plan of transacting business.

II. Technically:

1. Anat.: A term introduced by Bichat, used of any structure taken as a whole; as, the nervous system.

*2. Ancient Music: An interval compounded, or supposed to be compounded, of several lesser intervals, as the octave, the elements of which are called diatems.

3. Astron.: A theory of the movements and mutual relations of the heavenly bodies, especially of the sun, moon, and planets, and the laws by which these are regulated. Used of the Ptolemaic System, the Copernican System, the Newtonian System, &c. (all which acc.)

"The great system in which the sun acts the part of the primary, and the planets of its satellites."—Herschel: Astronomy, § 533.

4. Biol.: Method of arrangement on a comprehensive plan. Used specially in Botany, where first Linnaeus's Sexual System—the Artificial—for a time prevailed, to be followed by the Natural System, which is now in use. By the Natural System some understand only the placing together of such plants or animals

T, the twentieth letter and the sixteenth consonant of the English alphabet, la a sharp, mute consonant, and closely allied to d, both being dentals. It is formed by pressing the tip of the tongue closely against the root of the upper teeth, and it differs from d only in being non-vocal, while d is uttered with voice. T followed by h in the same syllable has two distinct sounds; the one surd or breathed, as in think, thank, thought, representing the Anglo-Saxon þ; the other sonant, or vocal, as in this, that, though, representing the Anglo-Saxon ð. T before a vowel, and unaccented, usually passes into sh, as in nation, portion, partial, which are pronounced nashon, porshon, parschal. When s or z precede t, the t retains its proper sound, as in question, though before u it is often softened into ch (as in church), as also in such words as mixture, posture, &c. In accordance with Grimm's law (q.v.), t in English (as also in Dutch, Icelandic, Gothic, &c.) is represented in Latin, Greek, and Sanscrit by d, and in German by t or z. Thus Eng. tooth (for tooth) = Lat. dens, genit. dentis, Gr. odóns (odous), genit. ódovros (odonotos), Sansc. dant, Ger. zahñ, O. H. Ger. zand; Eng. heart = Lat. cor, genit. cordis, Gr. kardia (kardia), Sansc. kridaya, Ger. herza; Eng. eat = Lat. edo, Gr. edō (edō), Sansc. ad, O. H. Ger. éan, Ger. ersen. If the t is preceded by s, this rule does not apply, as in Eng. stand = Lat. sto, Gr. στῆμι (histēmi), Ger. stehen. Th in English, &c., is represented in Latin, Greek, and Sanscrit by t, and in German by d; thus, Eng. thou = Lat. tu, Gr. tu (tu), Sansc. tham, Ger. du; Eng. three = Lat. tres, Gr. treis (treis), Sansc. tri, O. H. Ger. dri, Ger. drei. In a few instances t in English represents an l in Latin, as in tear (s.) = Lat. lacrima. In bat and mate, t supplies the place of an original k (O. Eng. bak and make). An original t is sometimes represented by d in English; cf. proud = O. Eng. prut; diamond = Fr. diamant; card = Fr. carte, Lat. charta. An original t has become th in author = Lat. auctor. It has disappeared from the middle of a word in best = O. Eng. betst; last = O. Eng. last; from the end of a word in amitil = O. Eng. amitil; petty = Fr. petit; dandelion = Fr. dent de lion. T has crept in (1) after s, as in behest, amongst, against, amidst, whilst, betwixt; (2) in tyrant = O. Fr. tiran, Lat. tyrannus; parcament = O. Fr. parchemin; cormorant = Fr. cormoran; ancient = Fr. ancien; pheasant = O. Fr. phoisan. Th represents an original d in hither, whether, faith = O. Fr. feld, Lat. fides. An original th has become d in could = O. Eng. cuth; huddle = O. Eng. finthle; Beulah = Behlehem; it has become t in theft = A.S. theofth; nostril = A.S. nasthyrith; it has disappeared from Norfolk = North-folk; worship = A.S. weorthscipe. T is often doubled in the middle of words, occasionally at the end, as in butt, mitt. T is often used to denote things of the shape of the capital letter; cf. T-bandage, T-square, &c.

T, as a symbol, is used in numerals for 160, and with a stroke over it (T̄) for 160,000.

¶ (1) Marked with a t: A thief. An expression equivalent to the trium literarum homo of Plautus (Aul., 11. iv. 47). The English phrase derives its force from the fact that thieves were formerly branded in the hand with the letter T.

(2) To a t: Exactly; to a nicety; with the utmost exactness; as, That fits me to a t.

ta-bâ-nûs, s. [Lat. = a gadfly (q.v.).]

Entom.: The type-genus of Tabanidae (q.v.). Antennæ three-jointed, the last joint deeply notched at the side and ringed near the tip. Tabanus borinus, the Breeze-fly, one of the largest species, occurs in Britain. T. autumnalis and T. tropicus are much more common.

* tab-ard, * tab-êrd, * tab-êrt, * tab-êld, s. [O. Fr. tabart, tabard; Fr. tabard; Sp. & Port. tabardo; Ital. tabarro; Wel. tabar; M. H. Ger. tapfart, taphart. Origin unknown.] A light vestment worn over the armour, and generally embroidered with the arms of the wearer. It was close-fitting, open at the sides, with wide sleeves or flaps reaching to the elbows. It originally reached to the middle of the leg, but was afterwards made shorter. It was at first worn chiefly by the military, but afterwards became an ordinary article of dress of other classes in England and France, in the middle ages. The illustration shows the tabard and other official dress of Garter King of Arms, in 1417, when the office was created by Henry V. for the service of the Order of the Garter, which till then had been attended by Windsor heralds. The tabard is now worn only by heralds and pursuivants at arms, and is embroidered with the arms of the sovereign.

tab-a-ahêr, s. [From the Persian.] Min.: A hydrated silica, belonging to the Opal group, deposited in irregular masses about the joints of certain varieties of the bamboo. Colour, yellowish white; fracture, somewhat resinous; translucent to opaque. Adheres strongly to the tongue. Resembles hydrophane (q.v.), when immersed in water becoming quite transparent. Very brittle.

tab-bied, pa. par. of a. [TABBY, v.]

tab-bin-êt, s. [TABINET.]

tab-by, a. & s. [Fr. tabis, from Sp. tabi = a silken stuff, from Arsb. utabi = a kind of rich undulated silk.]

A. As adjective:

- 1. Having a wavy or watered appearance. "The potent warriors of the tabby vest." Parnell: Battle of Frogs & Mice, l.

2. Brindled, brind; diversified in colour.

"The cat, if you but slings her tabby skin, The chimney keeps, and sits content within." Pope: Wife of Bath, 14.

B. As substantive:

I. Ordinary Language:

- 1. Silk or other stuff having an irregularly waved or watered surface produced by pressure, usually between engraved rollers in the mode of calendaring, known as tabbying. There is but little difference between tabbying, watering, and moiré, the effect in each case being produced by the flattening of some of the fibres while the others remain undisturbed, causing the different parts to reflect the light unequally.

"To mingle pride the small-wrought tissue shines Perchance of tabby or of harateen." Swif. (Todd.)

- 2. A mixture of lime with shells, gravel, or stones in equal proportions, forming a mass, which, when dry, becomes as hard as rock. It is used in Morocco as a substitute for brick or stone in building. (Wcale.)

- 3. A cat of a mixed or brindled kind; a cat generally. (Collog.)

"As in her ancient mistress' lap The youthful tabby lay." Cooper: Familiarity Dangerous.

- 4. An old maiden lady; an old spinster; a gossip. (Collog.)

"I am not sorry for the coming in of these old tabbies, and am much obliged to her admirer for letting us to such an agreeable tête-à-tête."—G. Colman the Elder: Jealous Wife, II. 4.

II. Entom.: A common British moth, Aglossa pinguinialis, one of the Pyralites; grayish-brown, clouded with a darker colour; hind wings grayish-brown; larva seen on greasy horse-cloths, &c. The Small Tabby is Aglossa cuprealis, and has the hind wings whitish. It is rarer.

tabby-cat, s. A brindled cat; a tabby.

tab-by, v. [TABBY, a.] To calender so as to give a tabby or wavy appearance to, as stuffs; to water or cause to look wavy; as, to tabby silk, mohair, &c. It is done by a calender without water.

tab-by-îng, s. [TABBY, v.]

Fabric: The act or process of passing fabrics between engraved rollers to impart a wavy or watered appearance.

"Meat eaten in greater quantity than is convenient tabes the body."—Barry: On Consumption.

* ta-bêl-li-ôn, s. [Lat. tabellio, from tabella = a tablet, dimin. from tabula = a table (q.v.).] A kind of secretary or notary; a scrivener. (Such a functionary existed under the Roman Empire, and during the old monarchy in France.)

* ta-bêr, v. i. [TABOR, v.]

tab'-bêrg-ite, s. [After Taberg, Sweden, where found; suff. -ite. (Min.)]

Min.: A variety of the chlorite group of minerals, which has been referred by different mineralogists both to penninite and clinocllore (Dana's ripidolite). Colour, bluish green. From optical observations Des Cloizeaux states that it sometimes consists of mixial and biaxial laminae combined, the axial divergence varying as much as from 1° to 33°, thus indicating a mixture of the members of this group.

tab-êrn, s. [Lat. taberna = a tavern.] A cellar. (Pror.)

tab-êr-nac-le (le as el), s. & a. [Fr., from Lat. tabernaculum, a double dimin. from taberna = a hut, a shed; Sp. & Port. tabernaculo; Ital. tabernacolo.] [TAVERN.]

A. As substantive:

I. Ordinary Language:

- * 1. Lit.: A slightly-constructed temporary building or habitation; a tent, a pavilion. "The Emperor had caused to be made a certain pavilion or tabernacle eight square."—P. Holland: Plutarch, p. 107.

2. Figuratively:

(1) A temple; a place of worship; a sacred place; specifically, the temple of Solomon.

"Lord, who shall abide in thy tabernacle? who shall dwell in thy holy hill?"—Psalm cv. 1.

(2) The human frame as the temporary abode of the soul.

"I think it meet, as long as I am in this tabernacle to stir you up by putting you in remembrance; knowing that shortly I must put off this my tabernacle, even as our Lord Jesus Christ hath showed me."—2 Peter, I. 13, 14.

II. Technically:

1. Jewish Antiq.: Heb. מִשְׁכָּן (mishkan) = a dwelling; אֹהֶל (ohel) = a tent, more fully denominated Tabernacle of the Congregation, and Tabernacle of Witness, a tent constructed by direction of Moses, under divine authority, to be a local habitation for Jehovah while his people moved from place to place in the wilderness—a temple being obviously unobtainable to the period of the wandering. To obtain materials for the construction of this sacred tent free-will offerings were solicited, and the Jews, in response, brought gold, silver, "brass" (copper), cloths, rams' skins dyed red, oil, spices, precious stones, &c. (Exod. xxv. 1-9; xxxvi. 1-5). Bezaleel and Aholiab, men divinely endowed with genius for the purpose, were the actual builders (xxxv. 30-34; xxxvi. 4). The tabernacle was 30 cubits (i.e., 45 feet long), 10 cubits (15 feet) wide, and 10 cubits (15 feet) high. The material was "shittim" (acacia) wood, 20 boards of which, standing upright, constituted each of the longer (i.e., the north and south) sides, and six the west one, while the east end was open. Each board was fastened below by tenons fitting into two silver sockets; they were held in their places by five bars of acacia wood on each side and five at the end, passing horizontally through rings of gold fastened in the upright boards. The interior was divided into an outer room 20 cubits long by 10 broad, called the Holy Place, or Sanctuary, and an inner apartment, 10 cubits (15 feet) long by 10 broad, named the Most Holy Place, or Holy of Holies. At the east, or open end, were five pillars of acacia wood, overlaid with gold, supporting a veil or curtain of fine linen with needlework of blue, crimson, and scarlet. Each pillar stood on a brass socket and was furnished with golden hooks. Between the Holy Place and the Place Most Holy was another veil or curtain of the same material as the first, but the pillars supporting it rested on silver sockets. Four different kinds of curtains or coverings supplied the place of a roof. The first, or inner one, of the same material as the two veils, was of ten curtains, each 28 cubits (42 feet) long by 20 cubits (30 feet) broad. The covering exterior to this was of fine goats' hair, then there was one of sheep skins dyed red, then one of עֹרֹת (achash), rendered in the text of the Revised Version seal skins, and in the margin porpoise skins. Within the Holy Place, on the north side, was the golden table with the shew-bread on it, and on the south side the golden candlestick, and the golden altar of incense. In the Holy of Holies were the Ark of the Covenant and the mercy-seat (Exod. xxvi. 1-37; xxxvi. 1-38; Heb. ix. 1-5). Around the tabernacle was the court of the tabernacle 100 cubits (150 feet) long, by 50 cubits (75 feet) broad, surrounded by sixty pillars each five cubits (7½ feet) high, with silver capitals and hooks, and brass sockets. The four pillars in the eastern side supported a veil or curtain constituting the gate of the court. The brazen altar and the laver were in the courtyard. Around the latter were the tents of the Levites, and beyond these those of the other tribes, three on each side of the tabernacle. Only the priests entered the Holy Place. This they did twice daily, in the morning to extinguish the lights, in the evening to light them anew. None but the high priest could enter the Holy of Holies, and he only once a year, on the great day of Atonement. The Gershonites, the Merarites, and the Kohathites took charge of the tabernacle and its furniture when these were removed from place to place. The tabernacle was first set up by Moses on the first day of the second year after the Israelites had left Egypt. After they had reached Canaan it was located at Shiloh (1 Sam. iv. 3-25). In Saul's time it was at Nob (cf. 1 Sam. xxi. 1 and Mark ii. 26). When Solomon became king it was at Gibeon (1 Kings iii. 4). Afterwards Solomon laid it up in the Temple, of which in all its leading features it had been the model (1 Kings viii. 4, 2 Chron. v. 5). [TEMPLE, s., ¶.]

2. Eccles. & Church Hist.: In the Roman Church, a receptacle for the consecrated Host for benediction and the ciborium containing the smaller Hosts which the laity receive. In its present form—a small structure of marble, metal, or wood, placed in the centre of the east side of the altar—the tabernacle dates from the sixteenth century. Its original form was that of a dove; about the middle of the fourteenth century it was sometimes placed in an ambry above the altar. A lamp constantly burns before the tabernacle, which is kept locked, the key never passing out of the charge of the clergy. The name tabernacle is also given to (1) a niche for an image, (2) a reliquary, (3) the ambry near the high altar when used to contain the reserved sacrament, and (4) the abbot's stall in choir.

3. Naut.: An elevated socket for a boat's mast, or a projecting post to which a mast may be hinged when it is fitted for lowering to pass beneath bridges.

"The mizen mast to be stepped in a tabernacle on a false trussion in front of the rudder head."—Fleed, Feb. 15, 1865.

 B. As adj.: The same as TABERNACULAR (q.v.).

¶ Feast of Tabernacles:

Jewish Antiq.: תבועות (חגג hassukkoth), one of the three leading Jewish feasts, on the recurrence of which all the males were required to present themselves at Jerusalem. During this feast the people dwelt on their housetops or elsewhere in booths made of the branches of trees, in commemoration of their tent life in the wilderness. Called also the Feast of Ingathering, because it was a feast of thanksgiving for the completion of the harvest and the vintage. It lasted for eight days, from the 15th to the 23rd of Tisri, corresponding to October. The first and the eighth days were holy convocations (Exod. xxiii. 16; Lev. xxiii. 34; Num. xxix. 12; Deut. xvi. 13). It is believed that the eighth day of the Feast of Tabernacles was the last great day of the feast at which Jesus preached (John vii. 37).

tāb-ēr-nāo-ū-lar, a. [Lat. tabernaculum] = a tabernacle; Eng. adj. suff. -ar.]

1. Sculptured with delicate tracery or open-work; latticed.

"The sides of every street were covered with fresh alures . . . fronted with tabernacular or open work, vaulted."—Warren: Hist. Eng. Poetry, II. 93.

2. Of or pertaining to a tabernacle.

* 3. Of or pertaining to a booth or ahop: hence, common, low. (De Quincey.)

tā-bēr-nā-mōn-tā-na, s. [Named by Plumier, after James Theodore Tabernemontanus, who in 1588 published the first part of a great Herbal. He died in 1590.]

Bot.: A genus of Plumieriaceae. Flowers monopetalous; corolla salver-shaped; stamens five, included; anthers sagittate; style filiform; stigma dilated at the base, trifid; ovaries two, developing into two follicles; seeds immersed in deep red pulp. Tabernemontana utilis, the Hya-hya of Demerara, is one of the Cow trees. It pours forth a copious stream of thick, sweet, innocuous milk. T. coronaria is a small evergreen shrub, six or eight feet high, with silvery bark and glossy leaves. It is common in Indian gardens; its native country is unknown. The red pulp obtained from the aril is used as a dye by the hill people. An oil is prepared from T. dichotoma, a small Indian tree. The Ceylonese suppose its fruit to have been the forbidden fruit of paradise. The sap of T. persicariaefolia, found in Mauritius, is considered poisonous; its wood is used in turnery.

tā-bēs, s. [Lat., from tabeo = to waste away.]

Pathol.: A wasting away of the body however produced. It figured largely in the older writers, but is now limited to the three compounds subjoined.

† tabes-dorsalis, s.

tāb-lā-ture, s. [Fr., from Lat. tabula = a board, a table.]

1. Anat.: A division or parting of the skull into two tables.

2. Art.: A painting on a wall or ceiling.

"In painting we may give to any particular work the name of tablature, when the work is in reality a single piece, comprehended in one view, and formed according to one single intelligence, message, or design."—Lord Shaftesbury.

3. Music:

(1) A general name for all the signs and characters used in music. Those who were well acquainted with these signs were said to sing by the Tablature.

(2) A peculiar system of notation employed for instruments of the lute class, for viols, and certain wind instruments. The earliest systems of notation, like the music of Asiatic nations to this day, were different sorts of tablature. That which may be called the modern tablature was invented not earlier than the sixteenth century. In England tablature was employed for all stringed instruments, the number of lines employed being regulated by the number of strings the instrument possessed. Tablature for wind instruments was expressed by dots on a staff of six, seven, or eight lines, according to the number of holes in the instrument, the number of dots signifying the number of holes to be stopped by the fingers. Organ tablature was a system of writing the notes without the staff by means of letters. Thus, the several octaves were called great, little, one and two-line octaves, according to the style of letter employed to indicate them. The name has also been applied to figured bass. The illustration given is from the French and English tablature employed by John Dowland in his Books of Songs or Ayres (London, 1597-1603), and by most English lutenists.

"Well, those who affirm that these devices agree not to the minde of Plato, are yet of opinion, that those other agree very well to the propositions described in the tablature of musicians, which consisteth of five tetrachorda."—P. Holland: Plutarch, p. 327.

tā-ble, s. & a. [Fr., from Lat. tabula = a plank, a flat board, a table, from a root ta- or tan- = to stretch. From the same root comes thin (q.v.). Sp. tabla; Port. taboa; Ital. tavola; Dut. & Ger. tafel.]

A. As substantive:

I. Ordinary Language:

* 1. A flat surface of some extent; a flat, smooth piece; a slab.

"Upon the castle hill there is a bagna paved with fair tables of marble."—Sardya.

* 2. A surface flat and smooth to be painted on.

* 3. Hence, a painting, a drawing.

"The table wherein Detraction was expressed, he [Apelles] painted in this form."—Boyd: The Governor, bk. iii., ch. xxvii.

¶ A "painted table" was the common mode of designating a picture painted on wood, after the usual manner of medieval artists, in inventories of the period.

"His order was when he had finished a pece of worke or painted table, and laid it out of his hand, to set it forth in some open gallerie or thowrow fare to be seene of folks that passed by, and himselfe would lie close behind it to hearken what faults were found therewith."—P. Holland: Pisnie, bk. xxv., ch. ix.

* 4. A thin piece of something for writing on; a tablet.

"Written . . . not on tables of stone, but on fleshy tables of the heart."—2 Corinth. iii. 3

* 5. Hence, in plural, a memorandum-book, a note-book.

"His master's old tables, his note-book, his counsell-keeper."—Shakspeare: 2 Henry IV., II. 4.

6. An article of furniture, consisting of a flat surface or top of boards or other materials, supported on legs, and used for a great variety of purposes, as for supporting dishes, work, articles of ornament, &c., writing upon, or like like. Tables are distinguished according to size, shape, construction, material, purpose, &c.: as, a dining-table, a billiard-table, a folding-table, a toilet-table, &c.

"Yes, many a man, perdie, I could unmask. Whose desk and table makes a solemn show."—Thomson: Castle of Indolence, I. 52.

7. The persons seated at table or partaking of entertainment.

"To set the table on a roar." Shakspeare: Hamlet, v. I.

levels, which form basements, separate the stories of a building, and crown its upper portions; a string-course. (Oxford Glossary.)

3. Eccles.: The Communion table (q.v.). In the Prayer Book the expressions, Holy Table, the Lord's Table, occur, but in the Coronation Service the word Altar is used.

4. Glass-making:

(1) The flat disk of crown glass which is made from a bulb on the end of a blowing-tube, transferred to a ponty, gradually and finally flashed into a disk, by rotating in front of a flashing-furnace (q.v.). It is usually about four feet in diameter. Twenty-four tables make a case.

(2) The flat plate with a raised rim, on which plate-glass is formed.

5. Lapidary:

(1) Table-cutting; a form of diamond-cutting. The top of the stone is ground flat with a corresponding flat bottom of less area, with its four upper and lower facets cut parallel to each other.

(2) The upper flat surface of a brilliant cut diamond.

6. Mach.: The part on which work is placed to be operated upon.

7. Math., Nat. Philos., &c.: An arranged collection of many particulars, data, or values; a system of numbers calculated for expediting operations or for exhibiting the measures or values of some property common to a number of different bodies in reference to some common standard; a series of numbers which proceed according to some given law expressed by a formula. Thus there are tables of logarithms, of rhumbs, of specific gravity, of square or cube-roots, of aberration, &c.

* 8. Palmetry: The collection of lines on the palm of the hand.

"Mistress of a fairer table Hath not history nor fable."
Ben Jonson: Masque of Gypsies.

9. Perspective: The same as PERSPECTIVE-PLANE (q.v.).

10. Weaving: The board or bar in a drawloom to which the tails of the harness are attached.

B. As adj.: Appertaining to, provided or necessary for, or used at table: as, table linen.

† (1) Lord's table: The sacrament of the Lord's Supper or holy communion.

(2) Round table: [ROUND, a.]

(3) Table of Pythagoras: The common multiplication-table carried up to ten.

(4) Tables of the Law, Tables of the Testimony:

Jewish Antiq.: Two tables of stone, written or inscribed on both sides: "and the tables were the work of God, and the writing was the writing of God graven upon the tables" (Exod. xxxi. 16); "written with the finger of God" (xxxii. 18). After having received them from Jehovah, high on the ridge or peak of Sinai, Moses was carrying them down the mountain-side to the camp, when he was so overcome by passion on hearing the shouts raised by the people in connexion with idol-worship that he flung from him the tables of stone, which broke on the ground (17-19). They were divinely replaced by others (xxvii. 1-29), which were put in the ark (Deut. x. 5). The writing on the tables consisted of the Ten Commandments, probably the first four, teaching duty to God, on the first table, and the other six, telling of duty to man, on the second table (Mat. xxii. 36-39).

* (5) Tables Toletanes: The Alphonsine astronomical tables, so called from their being adapted to the city of Toledo. (Chavcer: C. T., 11, 565.)

(6) The Four Tables:

Scottish Church Hist.: An executive committee, consisting of four noblemen, four gentlemen, four ministers, and four burgesses, appointed in 1638 by the Presbyterians to manage their affairs during the struggle against the forcible introduction of the liturgy into the Scottish church. The name was given because the committee met in four separate rooms in Parliament House in Edinburgh, each room of course furnished with a separate table.

(7) To lay on the table: In parliamentary practice, and in the usage of corporate and other bodies, to receive any document, as a report, motion, or the like, but to agree to postpone its consideration indefinitely.

(8) To order (a bill or document) to lie on the table: To defer for future consideration; to postpone.

* (9) To serve tables:

Script.: To administer the aims of the Church. (Acts vi. 2.)

(10) To turn the tables: To change or reverse the condition or fortune of two contending parties; a metaphor taken from the vicissitudes of fortune at gaming-tables.

(11) Twelve Tables:

Roman Antiq.: The tables containing the body of Roman law drawn up by the decemvirs, B.C. 451; originally there were only ten of these tables, but two more were added in the following year.

Min.: A diamond prepared as a flat stone, with two opposite plane surfaces and bevelled edges.

table-knife, s. An ordinary knife used at table, as distinguished from a fruit-knife, a penknife, &c.

Phys. Geog.: A plateau; a plain existing at some considerable elevation above the sea. Volcanic rocks often make such table-lands, as in Central India; so do limestones. Or a sea-bed or lake-bed, or a great stretch of country, may be upheaved. The chief table-lands are in the Old World, extensive, low-lying plains rather than table-lands characterizing the New. One occupies about half the surface of Asia, being 5,500 miles from east to west, and from 700 to 2,000 miles from north to south. In Europe there are table-lands in parts of Switzerland, France, Spain, and Bavaria. African table-lands exist in Morocco, Abyssinia, the region of the Victoria Nyanza, &c. In the United States the great saline plain of Utah and the Great Plain lying east of the Rocky Mountains are examples.

"At sunrise we discovered a high table-land (an island) bearing E. by S."
Cook: Second Voyage, bk. III, ch. iv.

table-lathe, s. A hand-lathe (q.v.).

table-talk, s. Conversation at table or at meals; familiar conversation.

table-talker, s. A conversationalist; one who studies to lead or outshine others in table-talk.

table-turning, s. One of the earliest of the manifestations said to be produced by spiritual agency. A number of persons formed a circle round a table, on which their outstretched fingers lightly rested. After a time the table began to move, and to answer questions either by tilting or rapping at appropriate letters as the alphabet was repeated. The late Professor Faraday was of opinion that a rotary impulse was unconsciously imparted to the table by those who stood round it, and it has been pointed out that pushing may take place without any distinct consciousness on the part of those who push, and that expectant attention is known to produce such a state of the muscles as would occasion this unconscious pushing.

Eccles.: A word formed in the fifteenth century to express the position in which some altars were then placed—i.e., in the body of the church, with their ends east and west.

tā-boó', † tā-bū', * tā-pū', s. [South-Sea tabu; Maori tapu = sacred.]

2. Fig. : Prohibition of social intercourse with.

tā-boó', † tā-bū', v.t. [TABOO, s.]

1. Lit. : To put under taboo.

"Sometimes an island or a district was tabooed, when no cause or person was allowed to approach it."—Brown: Peoples of the World, ii. 48.

2. Fig. : To forbid the use of; to interdict approach to, or contact or intercourse with, as for religious or other reasons.

"Art and poetry were tabooed both by my rank and my mother's sectarianism."—Kingsey: Alton Locke, ch. 1.

tā-bōr, * tā-bōur, s. [O. Fr. tabor (Fr. tambour), from Sp. tambor, atambor, from Arab. tambūr = a kind of lute, a guitar with a long neck and six brass strings; also a drum; Pers. tambuk = a trumpet, a bagpipe; tambal = a small drum; tabir = a drum; Ital. tamburo.]

Music: A small shallow drum used to accompany the pipe, and beaten by the fingers. The old English tabor was hung round the neck, and beaten with a stick held in the right hand while the left hand was occupied in fingering a pipe. The pipe and tabor were the ordinary accompaniment of the morris-dance. The illustration is taken from the celebrated ancient window in the mansion of Geo. Tollet, Esq., Batley, Staffordshire. (See Hone's Year Book, July 17.)

"Dost thou live by thy tabor!"—Shakesp.: Twelfth Night, iii. 1.

"For in your court is many a losengeour That tabouren in your sweet many a soum."—Chaucer: Legend of Good Women. [Pro.]

* tā-bōr-ēr, * tā-bōur-ēr, s. [Eng. tabor; -er.] One who plays on a tabor.

"Would I could see this tabourer."—Shakesp.: Tempest, iii. 2.

tā-bōr-ēt, * tā-bōur-ēt, s. [Eng. tabor, dim. suff. -et.] A small tabor.

"We take our first glimpses of this diminutive, filmy taboret."—Barper's Magazine, July, 1868, p. 286.

tā-bōr-īne, tā-bōur-īne, s. [Fr. taborin.]

1. A tabor; a small drum in form of a sieve; a tambourine.
2. A side-drum.

"Trumpeters . . . Make mingle with our rattling taborines."—Shakesp.: Antony & Cleopatra, iv. 1.

Tā-bōr-ītes, s. pl. [Bohem. tabor = a tent.]

Church Hist. : A section of Calixtines, who received their name from a great encampment organized by them on a mountain near Prague in 1419, for the purpose of receiving the Communion in both kinds. On the same spot they founded the city of Tabor, and assembling an insurrectionary force, marched on Prague under the lead of Ziska (July 30, 1419), and committed great atrocities under the pretence of avenging insults offered to the Calixtine custom of communicating under both kinds. On the death of King Wenceslaus (Aug. 16, 1419) they began to destroy churches and monasteries, to persecute the clergy, and to appropriate church property on the ground that Christ was shortly to appear and establish his personal reign among them. They were eventually conquered and dispersed in 1433 by George Podiebrada (afterwards King of Bohemia).

tā-bōur, s. & v. [TABOR.]

* tā-bōur-ēt, s. [TABORET.]

1. A taboret.

"They shall depart the manor before him with trumpets, tabourets, and other minstrelsy."—Spectator.

2. A seat without arms; a stool. So called from its shape, which somewhat resembles a drum.

3. A frame for embroidery.

"Right of the tabouret (Droit de tabouret): A privilege formerly enjoyed by ladies of the highest rank in France of sitting on a tabouret in presence of the queen. [2.]

* tā-brōre, s. [Eng. tabor; -er.] A player on the tabor.

"I saw a shole of shepherds outgo, Before them yode a lusty tabore."—Spenser: Shepherd's Calendar; Juna.

* tā-brēt, s. [Eng. tabor; -et.] A small tabor; a taboret.

"So bright are they Who saffron-vested sound the taboret there."—A. Browning: Return of the Druses, ll.

tāb-u-lā (pl. tāb-u-lā), s. [Lat.]

* 1. Ord. Lang. : A table; a flat surface.

2. Zool. (Pl.) : Transverse partitions in certain corals; horizontal plates or floors, extending from side to side across the cavity of some corals, which they divide into chambers, one above another.

tabula-rasa, phr. [Lat. = a smooth waxed tablet, ready to receive any impression of the style.]

Philos. : A term used by the Sensational philosophers of the seventeenth century to describe the condition of the human mind before it has been the subject of experience, in opposition to the supporters of the theory of innate ideas. The origin of the expression is probably to be found in Aristotle (de Anima, lib. iii., c. iv., § 14.)

tāb-u-lar, a. [Lat. tabularis, from tabula = a table.]

1. In the form of a table; having a flat surface.

2. Formed in laminae or plates.

"All the nodules that consist of one uniform substance were formed from one point, except those that are tabular end plated."—Woodward: On Fossils.

fāte, fāt, fāre, āmidst, whāt, fāll, fāther; wē, wēt, hēre, camel, hēr, thēre; pine, pīt, sīre, sīr, marine; gō, pōt, or, wōre, wōlf, wōrk, whō, sōz; mūte, ōub, ōure, quite, cūr, rāle, fūll; trȳ, Sȳrian. æ, o = e; oy = ā; qu = kw.

3. Set down in or forming a table, list, or schedule: as, a tabular statement.

4. Derived from or computed by the use of tables: as, tabular right ascension.

tabular-bone, s.

Anat. (Pl.): Flat bones, as the scapula, the ilium, and the bones forming the roof and sides of the skull.

tabular-crystal, s. A crystal in which the prism is very short.

tabular-differences, s. pl. In logarithmic tables of numbers, a column of numbers marked D, consisting of the differences of the logarithms taken in succession, each number being the difference between the successive logarithms in the same line with it. When the difference is not the same between all the logarithms in the same line, the number which answers most nearly to it, one part taken with another, is inserted. In the common table of logarithms the logarithms of all the numbers from 1 to 10,000 can be found by inspection, but by the aid of the tabular differences the logarithms of numbers between 10,000 and 1,000,000 may be found. Also by the aid of the same differences the number corresponding to any logarithm can be found to five or six places. In logarithmic tables of sines, tangents, secants, cosines, cotangents, and cosecants, there are three columns of tabular differences on each page. The first of these is placed between the sines and cosecants, the second between the tangents and cotangents, and the third between the secants and cosines. These numbers are the differences between the logarithms on the left hand against which they are placed and the next lower increased in the proportion of 100 to 60. The use of these differences is to facilitate the finding of the logarithmic sine, tangent, secant, &c., for any given degrees, minutes, and seconds, or the degrees, minutes and seconds corresponding to any given logarithmic sine, tangent, secant, &c.

tabular-spar, table-spar, s.

Min.: The same as WOLLASTONITE (q.v.).

tabular-structure, s.

Geol. & Petrol.: A structure suggestive of a table or a series of tables, i.e., the structure of a rock, flat above, and with vertical seams or fissures.

tāb-u-lar-i-zā-tion, s. [Eng. tabularize]; -ation.) The act of tabulating or forming into tables; tabulation.

tāb-u-lar-ize, v. t. [Eng. tabularize]; -ize.] To form into tables; to reduce to a tabular form; to tabulate.

tāb-u-lar-lý, adv. [Eng. tabularly]; -ly.] In tabular form; by means of a list or schedule. "To set forth as much as possible tabularly or concisely these textures."—Lindsay; Mind in the Lower Animals, l. 62.

tāb-u-lā-tā, s. pl. [Nent. pl. of Lat. tabulatus = boarded, floored, from tabula (q.v.).]

Zool. & Paleont.: A group of Madreporaria Perforata. Tabulata corals, having the visceral chamber divided into stories by tabulae, and with the septa rudimentary or absent. The group is of doubtful stability, some recent genera, as Millepora, Heliopora, &c., having been removed from it, and various fossil genera Favosites, Chaetetes, Siringopora, Halysites, &c., being placed in it provisionally. Families Favositidae, Chaetetidae, Thecidæ, and Halysitidae. From the Silurian onward.

tāb-u-lāte, a. [Mod. Lat. tabulatus, pa. par. of tabulo = to form into a table; Lat. tabula = a table.] Table-shaped, tabulated; specific, or of pertaining to the Tabulata (q.v.).

tabulate-corals, s. pl. [TABULATA.]

tāb-u-lāte, v. t. [TABULATE, q.]

1. To reduce to tables; to make tables of.

"Dispose, tabulate, and calculate scattered ranks of numbers, and easily compute them."—Barrow; Mathematical Lectures, (Pref., p. 22).

* 2. To shape with a flat surface.

"Many of the best diamonds are pointed with six angles, and some tabulated or plain, and square."—Grew; Museum.

tāb-u-lā-tion, s. [TABULATĪO, v.] The act, art, or process of forming tables or tabular statements; the act of reducing data to a tabular form; data reduced to a tabular form.

* tāc, s. [TACK.]

Law: A kind of customary payment by a tenant.

* tac-free, a.

Old Law: Exempt from rents, payments, &c.

tāc-a-hōut, s. [Arab.] The native name of the small gall formed on the tamarisk-tree (Tamarix indica).

tāc-a-mā-ha-oā, tāc-a-mā-hāc, s. [Native name.]

1. A resinous, balsamic, bitter, aromatic exudation, found in winter on the buds of Populus nigra, P. balsamifera, P. canadensis, &c. It is said to be diuretic and antiscorbutic. It is made into an ointment for tumours, wounds, and burns, and constitutes the basis of a balsam and tincture used for colic, &c.

2. The resin of an amyrid, Elaophyllum tomentosum, from the West Indies and Mexico.

3. The resin of Calophyllum Calaba, from the East Indies.

4. A resin from the roots of Calophyllum Inophyllum, from the Isle of Bourbon.

tāc-ca, s. [Malay.]

Bot.: The typical genus of Taccaceæ (q.v.). Calyx six-partite; corolla six-parted; stamens six, inserted in the calyx; styles three; stigmas stellate. Berry hexangular, dry, many-seeded. In the Malay Peninsula and the Moluccas the tubers of Tacca pinnatifida, T. dubia, and T. montana are rasped and macerated in water, a fecula being extracted, which is eaten like sago. The first species is much grown in Travancore. The fecula which it yields is imported into England, and used as a substitute for West-Indian arrowroot. It is called also T. youty. Its stalks are split and made into bonnets in the South Sea Islands. T. cristata is the water-lily of Singapore.

tāc-cā-cc-æ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. taccæ]; Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -accæ.]

Bot.: Taccads; an order of Endogens, alliance Narcissales. Large perennial herbs with a tuberous root. Leaves radical, stalked, exstipulate, undivided or pedatifid, the segments pinnatifid and entire, with curved parallel veins. Flowers at the extremity of a scape, in umbels, surrounded by undivided bracts, constituting an involucre. Perianth six-lobed, the tube superior, the limb petaloid, equal or unequal; stamens six, persistent, with dilated filaments; styles three, connate; ovary of three carpels, with five parietal placentæ; many-seeded; fruit baccate, with lunate striated seeds. Known genera two, species eight; found in damp forests, especially near the sea in tropical India, Africa, and the South Sea Islands.

tāc-cād, s. [Mod. Lat. taccæ]; Eng. suff. -ad.]

Bot. (Pl.): Liodley's name for the Taccaceæ (q.v.).

tā-cé (o aa ch), v. i. [Ital., imperative sing. of tacere = to be silent.]

Music: A direction that a particular voice, instrument, or part is to be silent for a certain specified time.

* tāc-ēs, s. pl. [TASSES.] Armour for the thighs.

tā-cēt, v. t. [Lat., 3rd pers. sing. pres. indic. of taceo = to be silent.]

Music: The same as TACE (q.v.).

* tāch, *tāche (1), s. [A softened form of tack (q.v.).]—Something used for taking hold or holding; an attachment; a catch, a loop, a button, or the like.

"Make fifty taches of gold, and couple the curtains together with the taches."—Exod. xxv. 6.

tāche (2), s. [Fr.] A pan in a battery of sugar-pans. The term is, however, often especially applied to the smallest of the five; that immediately over the fire, from which the concentrated juice is transferred to the cooler, also called the Striking-tache.

* tāche (3), *tacch, s. [Fr.] A spot, a stain, a blemish.

"The heryng or selenge of any vise or yvell tache."—Etyol; Governour, bk. l., ch. lii.

* tāche, v. t. [TACHE (1), s.] To attach, to fasten.

tāch-ē-ōg-ra-phý, s. [TACHYGRAPHY.]

tāch-i-a, s. [Gulanan tachi = an ant's nest. So named because the trunks and branches are generally full of ants.]

Bot.: A genus of Gentianæ. Plants with yellow flowers, found in the West Indies, Guiana, &c.

tāch-i-nā, s. [TACHINUS.]

Entom.: The typical genus of Tachinariæ. One of the largest species is Tachina grossa, found in Continental Europe and in Britain. It is two-thirds of an inch long, black, and covered with bristles, the head and the base of the wings reddish yellow.

tāch-i-nār-i-æ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. tachinæ]; Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -ariæ.]

Entom.: A group of Muscidae. Bristles projecting from the third joint of the antennæ, either entirely naked or hairy, or plumose only at the base. Scales behind the base of the wings very large, entirely concealing the halteres. Flies with hairy bodies, moderately stout, and flying with great rapidity. The larvæ feed as parasites upon caterpillars of the Lepidoptera and of sawflies, also on beetles, field bugs, earwigs, grasshoppers, bees, wasps, and spiders. Many hundred species exist in Europe, and they are abundant in all parts of the world.

* tā-chín-i-dæ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. tachinæ]; Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -idæ.]

Entom.: A family of Brachelytra, now merged in Staphylinidae. Small, excessively agile beetles of convex tapering form, with pentamerous tarsi. They frequent flowers.

tach-i-nūs, s. [Gr. τάχινος (tachinos), poetic for τάχος (tachus) = quick, swift.]

Entom.: A genus of Staphylinidae, with antennæ thickening insensibly, and somewhat pear-shaped, the palpi filiform, the legs spinous.

tāch-ē-grāph, s. A device for registering rotary speed.

tā-chōm-ē-tēr, s. [Gr. τάχος (tachos) = speed, swiftness, and μέτρον (metron) = a measure; Fr. tachomètre.] An instrument for measuring velocity; specifically—

(1) An instrument for measuring the velocity of machines by means of the depression occasioned in a column of fluid by centrifugal force, which causes the fluid in the cistern (with which the graduated column is connected) to sink in the centre more and more with every increase of velocity. Thus the graduated column falls on the scale as the velocity is augmented, and rises as the velocity is diminished.

(2) An instrument for measuring the speed of flowing liquids. One form has several spiral vanes on a shaft carrying an endless screw, which turns a series of geared wheels. On being placed in a current, the vanes assume a position perpendicular thereto, and their rotation actuates the clock-work mechanism which is graduated to indicate the velocity of the liquid in miles per hour, or other units of measurement.

* tāch-ý, a. [Eng. tache (3); -y.] Vicious, corrupt.

tāch-ý, pref. [Gr. τάχος (tachus) = swift.] Attended with swiftness; endowed with speed.

tāch-ý-a-phāl-tite, s. [Pref. tachy; Gr. ἀφάλλος (aphallos) = a springing off, and suff. -ite.]

Min.: An altered form of Zircon (q.v.), occurring in crystals in the gneiss of Kragero, Norway. Decomposes before the blowpipe, hence the name.

* tāch-ý-di-dāx-ý, s. [Pref. tachy, and Gr. διδαξις (didaxis) = teaching; διδασκω (didaskō) = to teach.] A short or rapid method of imparting knowledge.

tāc-hý-drite, s. [Pref. tachy; Gr. ὑδρῶν (hydron) = water, and suff. -ite.]

Min.: A deliquescent mineral, occurring in rounded masses, having two cleavages, in the salt-mines of Stassfurt, Prussia. Colour, yellowish; transparent. Compo.: chlorine, 41.17; calcium, 7.76; magnesium, 9.30; water, 41.77 = 100, which corresponds with the formula (CaCl + 2MgCl) + 12H₂O.

bell, boy; pout, jowl; cat, cell, chorus, chin, bench; go, gem; thin, this; sin, as; expect, Xenophon, exist. ph = f
-dan, -tian = shan. -tion, -sion = shün; -tion, -sion = zhün. -cious, -tious, -sious = shüs. -ble, -dle, &c. = del del täch-y-drö-mí-g, s. [TACHYDROMUS.] Entom.: A genus of Empida (q.v.), akin to Ocydromia (q.v.).

täch-y-drö-mí-an, s. [TACHYDROMUS.] Any individual belonging to the genus Tachydromia (q.v.) or Tachydromia (q.v.).

ta-chýd-rö-müs, s. [Gr. ταχυδρόμος (tachydromos) = swift-running: ταχύς (tachys) = swift, and δρόμος (dromos) = a running, a course.]

1. Ornith.: Illiger's name for the genus Cursorinus.

2. Zool.: A genus of Lacertidae, with seven species widely scattered in Chinese Asia, Japan, Borneo, and West Africa. Head pyramidal and long, collar of keeled scales, ventral scales keeled, tail not spined.

*täch-y-glös-süs, s. [Pref. tachy-, and Gr. γλῶσσα (glossa) = a tongue.]

Zool.: Illiger's name for the genus Echidna (q.v.).

ta-chýg-ra-phër, *ta-kig-ra-phër, s. [Eng. tachygraph(y); -er.] Ous who writes in shorthand; a stenographer.

"Tachygraphers do not, however, deem it necessary to distinguish between the vowel sounds in basil and basil."—Scribner's Magazine, Dec., 1878, p. 300.

täch-y-gräp-h-ic, täch-y-gräp-h-ic-al, [Eng. tachygraph(y); -ic, -ical.] Of or pertaining to tachygraphy; written in shorthand.

"No help!" said I, "no tachygraphic power." To interpose in this unequal hour."—Byron: Robbery of the Cambridge Coach.

tä-chýg-ra-phý, *ta-kig-ra-phý, s. [Gr. ταχύς (tachys) = swift, and γράφω (graphō) = to write.] The act or practice of rapid writing; shorthand, stenography.

"In tachygraph, each vocal element does have one, and only one, distinct sign, absolute in value."—Scribner's Magazine, Dec., 1878, p. 300.

täch-y-lite, täch-y-lyte, s. [Pref. tachy-, and Gr. ἄλιος (alios) = dissolved; Ger. tachylyt.]

Min. & Petrol.: A massive substance, without cleavage, and resembling obsidian. Formerly regarded as a distinct mineral species, but now shown by Judd and others to be only a vitreous form of basalt, with which it is always associated. It varies in composition according to the basalt which it represents, but the percentage of silica present is usually above that of ordinary basalt.

tachylite-basalt, s.

Petrol.: A basalt in which certain parts, having the general composition of the mass, exist in a vitreous state, this condition (tachylite) being mostly confined to the sides of the vein or dyke.

ta-chýp-ä-tës, s. [Gr. ταχυπέτης (tachypetes) = flying fast: ταχύς (tachys) = fast, and πέτος (petos) = to fly.]

Ornith.: Frigate bird; a genus of Pelicanidae. Bill with the tips of both mandibles curved; wings excessively long and deeply forked. Tachypetes aquila is the Frigate-bird (q.v.).

ta-chýp-ör-üs, s. [Gr. ταχύπορος (tachyporos) = fast-going, quick of motion: ταχύς (tachys) = quick, and πορος (poros) = a passage.]

Zool.: A genus of Staphylinidae, akin to Tachinus, but with awl-like palpi. Eleven or more British species.

täc-it, *tac-ite, a. [Lat. tacitus, from taceo = to be silent; Fr. tacite.] Implied, but not directly expressed in words.

"This implies also upon a tacit or implicit permission of law."—By. Taylor: Rule of Conscience, bk. III, ch. II.

taoit-relocation, s. [RELOCATION, ¶.]

täc-it-ly, *tac-ite-ly, adv. [Eag. tacit; -ly.] In a tacit manner; silently; by implication, but not directly in words.

"In those things in which they have agreed tacitly, or expressly, they have no obligation."—By. Taylor: Rules of Conscience, bk. II, ch. I.

täc-i-türn, a. [Fr. taciturne, from Lat. taciturnus, from tacitus = tacit (q.v.).] Habitually silent; not apt to speak.

"Oodolphu, cautious, taciturn, did his best to preserve neutrality."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. VI.

täc-i-tür-ni-tý, *tac-i-tur-ni-tie, s. [Fr. taciturnité, from Lat. taciturnitate, acens. of taciturnitas, from taciturnus = taciturn (q.v.).]

1. Ord. Lang.: The quality or state of being taciturn; habitual silence or reserve in speaking.

"A class of people not distinguished by taciturnity or discretion."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. XVIII.

2. Scots Law: A mode of extinguishing an obligation in a shorter period than by the forty years' prescription. This mode of extinguishing obligations is by the silence of the creditor, and arises from a presumption that he would not have been so long silent if the debt had not been paid or the obligation implemented. As a general rule, the periods of prescription are adopted as superseding the common law doctrine of taciturnity.

*täc-i-türn-ly, adv. [Eng. taciturn; -ly.] In a taciturn manner; silently.

täck, s.t. & i. [TACK (1), s.]

A. Transitive:

1. To fasten, to attach.

"This shute was tacked about his bodye."—Fabyan: Chronycle (an. 1385).

2. To attach, secure, or join together in a slight or hasty manner, as by tacks or stitches.

"Tack a tiny bit of an old glove in."—Queen, Sept. 26, 1885.

3. To join together; to bring together.

"I had a kindness for them, which was right; But then I stopped not till I tacked to that A trust in them."—Browning: Paracelsus, iv.

4. To add as a supplement to, as to a bill in its progress through parliament; to append. (Generally with on.)

B. Intransitive:

Naut.: To change the course of a ship by shifting the tacks and position of the sails from one side to the other; to alter the course of a ship through the shifting of the tacks and sails. Tacking is an operation by which, when a ship is proceeding in a course making any acute angle with the direction of the wind on one of her bows, her head is tacked towards the wind, so that she may sail in a course making nearly the same angle on the other bow. This is effected by means of the rudder and sails.

"We saw land ahead, upon which we tacked and stood off."—Cook: First Voyage, bk. II, ch. VII.

täck (1), *tak, *takke, s. [Ir. taca = a peg, pin, nail; Gael. tacad = a tack, a peg, a stab. From the same root as attack, stake, and take; cf. Dut. tak; Dan. takke = a prong, a jag, &c.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. A small, flat-headed, sharp-pointed nail. Tacks are known as carpet, leathered, gimpe, brush, broom, felting. Their size is designated by the weight of 1,000, as 3-ounce, 6-ounce, 8-ounce, &c.

2. A drawing-pin (q.v.).

*3. A hook or clasp.

4. A stitch or similar slight fastening connecting two pieces.

*5. That which is attached or tacked on; a supplement, an addition, a rider.

"Some tacks had been made to money-bills in King Charles's time."—Burnet: Hist. Owen Times (an. 1705).

1. Nautical:

(1) The lower forward corner of a fore-and-aft sail.

(2) The lower, weather corner of a course, or lower square-sail.

(3) The rope by which the forward lower corner of a course or stay-sail is drawn forward and confined.

(4) A rope by which the lower corner of a studding-sail is drawn outward and held to the boom.

"Port hard, port! the wind grows scant, bring the tack aboard."—Dryden: Tempest, I.

(5) Hence, the course of a ship in regard to the position of her sails: as the starboard tack or port tack; the former when she is close-hauled with the wind on her starboard, the latter when close-hauled with the wind on her port side.

"When they change tacks they throw the vessel up in the wind, ease off the sheet, and bring the heel or tack-end of the yard to the other end of the boat, and the sheet in like manner."—Cook: Second Voyage, bk. III, ch. II.

2. Farming: The term used in some parts of England for the placing-out of cattle to feed on the pastures of another farmer at a price agreed upon; the hire of pasture for feeding purposes. (This and the following meaning are closely connected with take, v. (q.v.).)

3. Scots Law: A contract by which the use of a thing is set or let for hire; a lease.

¶ (1) Hard tack: [HARD-TACK.]

(2) Tack of a flag: A line spliced into the eye at the bottom of the tabling, for securing the flag to the halyards.

tack-block, s.

Naut.: A block for the tack of a sail. The studding-sail tack-blocks are at the ends of the booms.

tack-claw, s. A split tool for drawing tacks.

tack-driver, s.

1. A tack-hammer (q.v.).

2. A tool with a contrivance for automatically presenting the tacks in succession, and driving them into place.

tack-duty, s.

Scots Law: Bent reserved on a tack or lease.

tack-hammer, s. A small hammer used for driving and extracting tacks. The peen usually has either a thin edge, which may be inserted beneath the head of the tack, or is divided, to form a claw.

tack-tackle, s.

Naut.: A small tackle for pulling down the tacks of the principal sails.

tacks-pins, s. pl.

Naut.: Pins inserted in holes in various parts of a ship for belaying running gear to; belaying-pins.

*täck (2), s. [TACKS (3), s.] Stain, taint.

"You do not the thing that you would: that is perhaps perfectly, purely without some tack or stain."—Hammond: Works, iv. 412.

*täck (3), s. [Lat. tactus.] Touch, feeling, flavour, taste.

"Cheese which our fat sell to every quarter sends. Whose tack the hungry clown and plowman so commends."—Drayton: Poly-Obsion, s. 18.

täck (4), s. [Etyim. doubtful.] A shelf on which cheese is dried. (Prov.)

täck-ër, s. [Eng. tack, v.; -er.] One who tacks or makes additions.

"The noise has been so long against the tackers, that most of them thought their safest way was to deny it in their several countries."—Account of the Tack to a Bill in Parliament, p. 1.

* 3. The art of inventing and making machines for throwing darts, arrows, stones, and other missile weapons.

tac'-tíle, a. [Fr., from Lat. tactilis, from tactus, pa. par. of tango = to touch.] Capable of being touched or of being perceived by the sense of touch.

"At this proud yielding word
She on the scene her tactile sweets presented."
Beaumont: Psyche.

tactile-corpuscle, s.

Anat. (Pl.): One of the three kinds of sensory terminal organs. They were discovered by R. Wagner and Meissner. They are mostly of oval form, nearly one three hundredth of an inch long by one eight-hundredth thick. They have a core of soft homogeneous substance within, and a capsule of connective tissue with oblong transverse nuclei, like miniature fir cones, outside. They exist in certain papille in the skin of the hand and foot, on the fore arm, and the nipple. Called also Touch bodies.

tactile-papille, s. pl.

Anat.: Papillæ bearing the tactile corpuscles (q.v.).

tactile-sensibility, s.

Physiol.: Sensibility of touch existing in different degrees in different parts of the skin.

* tac'-til'-i-ty, a. [Eng. tactile]; -ity.]

1. The quality or state of being tactile or perceptible by the touch.

* tac'-tú-al, a. [Lat. tactus = touch.] Or pertaining to the sense or organs of touch; consisting in or derived from touch.

"Whether visual or tactual, every perception of the space-attributes of body is decomposable into perceptions of relative position."—Herbert Spencer: Principles of Psychology, § 62.

tade, s. [TOAD.] (Scotch.)

ta-dor'-na, s. [Etym. doubtful.]

Ornith.: A genus of Anatidae, with seven species, from the Palearctic and Australian regions. Beak about as long as the head, under mandible much narrower than upper, nail decurved, forming a hook, both mandibles with transverse lamellæ; nasal groove near base of beak; nostrils, oval, lateral, perfoliate; legs moderate, tibia naked for a little above the tarsal joint; toes three in front entirely webbed, one behind free; wings of moderate length. The sexes are nearly alike in plumage.

tad'-pòle, s. [Eng. toad, and poll = head, i.e., the toad that rears all head.]

Biol.: The larva of the Anurous Amphibia, sometimes extended so as to include larvæ of the Urodela, which undergo a much less complete metamorphosis. When hatched the young have no respiratory organs or limbs, but possess a tail, which is a powerful swimming organ. Branchial clefts soon develop, followed by ciliated external branchial plumes. The two pairs of limbs appear nearly simultaneously as small buds, the hinder pair at the junction of the tail and body, and the anterior pair concealed beneath the opercular membrane. The former are developed first, and when the gills are absorbed the latter appear; the tail then atrophies, and is completely absorbed, and the herbivorous gill-breathing tadpole becomes a lung-breathing carnivorous frog.

tadpole-fish, s. [TADPOLE-HAKE.]

tadpole-hake, s.

Ichthy.: Raniceps trifurcatus, from the coasts of northern Europe. It is a small fish, about twelve inches long, and of a darkish-brown colour, somewhat rare, but occasionally taken on the Scottish coast, and round Devon and Cornwall. The head is disproportionately large and broad, a circumstance which has given rise to its popular name. Called also the Trifurcated Hake, Tommy Noddy, and the Lesser Fork-head.

* tad'-pòle-dòm, s. [Eng. tadpole; -dom.] The tadpole state.

"The little beggars, an inch long, fresh from water and tadpole-dom."—C. Kingsley, in Life, II. 157.

tæo-nî-a, tæo-nî-a, s. [Lat., from Gr. tæniæ (tæniæ) = a band, a ribbon; tæino (tæinô) = to stretch.]

1. Arch.: The band or fillet surrounding the Doric epistylum.

2. Surg.: A ligature; a long and narrow ribbon.

3. Zool.: Tape-worm; the typical genus of Tæniada (q.v.), consisting of internal parasitic worms, having an elongated, jointed, pressed, jointed body.

The head is in general broader than the neck with four anterior depressions, and generally also a median retractile rostellum, frequently armed, especially when young, with one or two circles of minute recurved hooks. The genital organs at the margins of the joints, either on one side only, or on both margins, and on alternate joints. The species, which are very numerous, Rudolphi admitting 146 and Dujardin 135, are most common in birds, next in mammalia, then in fishes, and lastly in reptiles. (Griffith & Henfrey.) Tænia solium is the Tapeworm (q.v.).

EPISTYLIUM, SHOWING TÆNIA.

tænia hippocampi, s.

Anat.: A narrow white band prolonged from the fornix of the hippocampus major in the cerebrum. Called also corpus fimbriatum.

tænia semicircularis, s.

Anat.: A narrow flat band between the optic thalamus and the corpus striatum in the cerebrum.

tæo-nî-a-dæ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat., from Lat. tænia = a tape-worm.]

Zool.: Cestoid worms; an order of Plathelmintha or Scoleocida, containing the Tape-worms and Bladder-worms. Internal parasites, hermaphrodite when mature. The body is elongated, and consists of a head, with many flattened articulations. The small narrow head or acolæx contains nearly all the organs of the body, and is essentially the animal, the articulations, called metacæres or proglottides, being generative segments thrown off by the head in the manner called budding or "gemination." Each reproductive joint contains both male and female organs. The joints nearest the head are the newest, those farthest from it are the most mature. The anterior end of the body, or forepart of the acolæx, is provided with suckers, hooks, or foliaceous appendages, or with all three combined. There is no mouth or alimentary canal, so that it must derive materials for its nourishment only by absorption through the skin. The nervous system seems to consist of two small ganglia, sending filaments backward. There is a water-vascular system (q.v.). The whole animal is called a Strobilus. After a time some of the metacærea break off, the worm still continuing to grow. They continue to live till the ova are expelled. The numerous eggs which they contain ultimately rupture the tissue and escape after being voided with the evacuations of the person or animal in whose intestinal canal they were. The eggs are swallowed in water, or with grass and other herbs, and obtain a nidus for development in a new individual. The larvae are oval, and have three pairs of hooks arranged in bilateral symmetry. Besides the cestoid sexual forms, there are cystic asexual conditions of many Tæniada.

tæo-nî-a-nô-tûs, s. [Gr. tæniæ (tæniæ) = a band, and nôtos (nôtos) = the back.]

Ichthy.: A genus of Scorpenidae (q.v.), having the dorsal continuous with the caudal fin.

tæo-nî-i-for-mæg, s. pl. [Gr. tæniæ (tæniæ) = a ribbon, and Lat. forma = form.]

Ichthy.: A division of Acanthopterygii (q.v.), with a single family, Trachypteridae (q.v.).

tæo-nî-in, s. [Gr. tæniæ (tæniæ) = a tapeworm; inf. -in.]

Chem.: A name applied to kosine from the anthelmintic properties of the plant from which it is obtained.

tæo-nî-ô-câm-pæ, s. [Gr. tæniæ (tæniæ) = a tapeworm, and kampê (kampê) = a caterpillar.]

Entom.: A genus of Orthoside. Antennæ ciliated or pectinated in the male; abdomen smooth, a little depressed; fore-wings entire, thick, powdery; wings in repose forming a very sloping roof. Eleven British species. Tentocampa gothica is the Hebrew character moth. [Hebrew character (2).]

tæg, nî-ôld, a. [TÆNIODES.] Shaped like a tapeworm; ribbon-like.

tæo-nî-ôl-dô-i, s. pl. [Mod. Lat., from Gr. tæniæ (tæniæ) = a ribbon, and eidos (eidos) = form.]

Ichthy.: In Müller's classification, a family of Acanthopterygii, corresponding to the modern Tæniiformes (q.v.).

tæo-nî-ôl-dæg, s. pl. [Gr. tæniæ (tæniæ) = like a band, narrow, thin; tæniæ (tæniæ) = a ribbon, and eidos (eidos) = form.]

Zool.: The Tæniada (q.v.). (Cuvier.)

tæo-nî-ôp-têr-is, s. [Gr. tæniæ (tæniæ) = a ribbon, and pteris (ptêris) = a fern.]

1. Bot.: An exotic genus of Tænitidæa (q.v.).

2. Palæobot.: A genus of ferns with broad, ribbon-like fronds, simple or pinnate, secondary nerves running at right angles from the primary; fructification linear, the approximately parallel lines placed at the margin of the secondary veins. Six species from the Lower Jurassic of Britain, and a doubtful one from Central India.

tæo-nî-te, s. [Gr. tæniæ (tæniæ) = a band; auff. -ite; Ger. bandeisen.]

Min.: A name given to an alloy of iron and nickel found in certain meteoric irons, having the probable formula, Fe₂Ni₃.

tæo-nî-tîl-d-æ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. tænit(is); Lat. fem. pl. adj. auff. -ideæ.]

Bot.: A sub-tribe of Polyodiaceæ Ferna, having no indusium.

tæo-nî-tîs, s. [TÆNIA.]

Bot.: The typical genus of Tænitidæa (q.v.). Sori submarginal in the middle of the disk of the leaf, linear, elongate, and continuous; veins anastomosing more or less regularly into meshes.

tæo-nî-ür-a, s. [Gr. tæniæ (tæniæ) = a band, and oura (oura) = a tail.]

Ichthy.: A genus of Trygonidæa (q.v.), closely allied to the type-genus. [TAYGON.] There are six genera, from the East Indian seas and the fresh waters of tropical America.

tæ-ô-pîng, s. [See def.]

Hist.: A member of a Chinese sect founded by Hung-aw-tseuen, a man of humble birth, who had renounced idolatry. He pretended to have visions, and to have received a divine command to root out the Tartars and establish a new kingdom of Tai-ping, or Universal Peace. In 1840 he gathered together a number of followers, assumed the name of Heavenly Prince, and declared himself to be equal with Christ in power on the earth. In 1850 his followers rose against the Government, and succeeded in taking Nankin, but they were repulsed at Shanghai, in 1860, by the English and French, and though they afterwards rebelled many times, were finally suppressed by General Gordon. Their religion was a mixture of idolatry and Christianity; polygamy was allowed; and while they adopted baptism, they rejected the Lord's Supper.

ta-fê, s. [Native name.] A fermented liquor prepared from rice in Java.

*tâf-fa-ta, s. [TAFFETA.]

tâf-fê-ta, tâf-fê-tÿ, *tâf-fa-ta, *tâf-fa-tÿ, s. [Fr. taffetas, from Ital. taffeta, from Pers. tâfah = twisted, woven, taffeta; tâfah = to twist, to curl, to spin.] A term originally applied to plain woven silks; in more recent times signifying a light thin silk stuff with a considerable lustre or gloss. It was first made in England in 1598.

"There are taffeties of all colours, some plain, others striped with gold, silver, &c. others chequered, others flowered, others in the Chinese point, others the Hungarian; with various others, to which the mode or the caprice of the workmen give such whimsical names, that it would be as difficult as it is useless to rehearse them; besides that they seldom hold beyond the year wherein they first rose. The old names of Lyons, taffetas, and which still subsist, are Taffetas of Lyons, of Spain, and England, of Florence, of Avignon, &c. The chief consumption of taffeties is in summer dresses for women, and linings, la scarves, colls, window-curtains, &c."—Chambers: Cyclopædia (1741).

[Named after Tages, an Etrurian divinity, the grandson of Jupiter, said to have sprung from the earth in the form of a boy, and to have taught the Etrurians the art of ploughing.]

Bot.: The typical genus of Tagetes. Involucre simple, of five bracts, united into a tube, florets of the ray persistent, pappus of five erect bristles. Natives of Mexico, Peru, and Chili. About seventeen species are cultivated as garden flowers. Tagetes patula is the French Marigold, a native not of France, but of Mexico, whence it was brought to England in 1573. It is about a foot and a half high, has yellow, radiata, composite, strongly-scented flowers, which are in perfection in August. It is naturalized in Persia, India, and China, growing on the borders of rice fields, &c., at a distance from gardens. Many varieties are cultivated; some have double flowers, variegated with gold and orange-brown. T. erecta is the African Marigold, a native not of Africa, but of Mexico. It is larger than the last, and has double flowers, which are strongly scented. Both species should be raised from seed in a hot-bed at the beginning of April, and transplanted when they are three inches high. In India the flowers of the African Marigold are sold in the bazaars, and worn by women in their hair. A yellow domestic dye is said to be extracted from it by the poorer classes in India.

tái (1), * tayl, s. [A.S. tag, tægel; cogn. with Ice. tagl; Sw. tagel; Goth. tagl = hair.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. In the same sense as II. 4. (2).

2. The tail of a horse mounted on a lance, and used as a standard of rank and honour among the Turks and other Eastern nations. [PASHA.]

3. The hinder, lower, back, or inferior part of anything, as opposed to the head, the superior, or chief part.

"The lord shall make thee the head, and not the tail; and thou shalt be above, and not underneath." —Deut. xxviii. 13.

4. Anything more or less resembling a tail in shape or position.

"Duretus writes a great praise of the distilled water of those tails that hang upon willow trees." —Harvey: On Consumptions.

5. The reverse of a coin; the side opposite to that which bears the head as effigy. (Used chiefly in the phrase, "heads or tails," in tossing coins.)

6. The final portion of anything that takes place or has duration; as, the tail of a storm. (Colloq.)

7. The tag end of anything.

8. (PL.) [TAILING.]

9. A train or body of followers or attendants; a retinue. (Johnson: Tale of a Tub, il. 1.)

10. The lower end of a slate or tile.

11. The buttocks. (Colloquial.)

II. Technically:

1. Arch.: The bottom or lower part of a member or part.

2. Astron.: A luminous appendage streaming from the head of a comet, generally in a direction opposite to that of the sun.

3. Botany:

(1) A downy or feathery appendage to certain seeds, formed by the permanent elongate style.

(2) The long feathery, downy, or hairy termination of some fruits, as of Clematis chinensis.

(3) Any elongated, flexible, terminal part, as a petiole or peduncle. (Henslow.)

4. Comparative Anatomy:

(1) That tendon of a muscle which is fixed to the movable part.

(2) An appendage terminating the body behind. It is especially in the Vertebrates that it becomes important. In Fishes it is a vertical fin and a propeller, suggesting the screw of a modern steam-boat; it varies much in form, one distinction of anatomical and palæontological importance being that between the Heterocercal and the Homocercal tails. (See these words.) The former of these makes an approach to the tail of the Reptile. [For Tailed Amphibia see Urodela.] In Birds the tail consists of feathers, which assist to steady the animal in flight. The typical number of feathers in a tail is twelve, but in the Raucors it is eighteen, while in a few birds it is eight. In form it may be even, rounded, fan-shaped, graduated, cuneated, arcuated, spatulate, slender, forked, lyre-shaped, boat-shaped, compressed, plumed, or acanorsal. The tail in Catæcæna is modified into a powerful horizontal fin, acting as a propeller. In land mammals it varies in length, one use when it is well developed, as in the giraffe, the horse, &c., being to whisk away insects alighting to suck the blood. In Monkeys the tail greatly varies in length. In those of the New World it is long and prehensile; in many of those belonging to the Old World it is long but not prehensile. It is only rudimentary in the highest Apes. In Man it is normally absent, but the os coccygæ, with certain other vertebrae, are its homologues. At an early embryonic period it is free, and even after birth it has been known, though very rarely, to exist in a rudimentary state.

5. Cricket: A term applied to the last few men in a batting eleven who are rather weaker than the rest.

6. Mason.: The end of a stone step which is inserted into the wall; such a step has usually a tailing of nine inches.

7. Mining (Sing. or PL.): The streaks of slime left from the stamped ore, passed over a round or square buddle.

8. Music: That part of a musical note, as of a minim or crotchet, which runs perpendicularly upward or downward from the head or body; the stem.

9. Naut.: A rope fastened to a block, in order that it may be lashed to an object. [TAIL-BLOCK.]

10. Surg.: A portion of an incision at its beginning or end, which does not go through the whole thickness of the skin, and is more painful than a complete incision; a tailing.

Dana divides as follows:—(1) Follated; (2) Massive (steatite or soapstone); (a) Coarse Granular, including potstone; (b) Cryptocrystalline (French chalk); (c) Rensselairite, cryptocrystalline, but more often pseudomorphous; (d) Indurated: a very abundant mineral.

2. A commercial name for mica (q.v.).

¶ Oil of talc: [OIL OF TALC.]

talce-apatite, s.

Min.: An apatite, found in chlorite schist in the Urals, containing a large percentage of magnesia replacing lime. A magnesian-apatite.

talce-chlorite, s.

Min.: A mineral regarded by Marignac as intermediate between talc and chlorite, but stated by Des Cloizeaux to possess the optical characters of clinocllore. Dana suggests that it may be the latter mineral mixed with talc, which would account for the high percentage of silica.

talce-gneiss, s.

Petrol.: A gneiss which contains a hydrated mica, frequently, but erroneously, called talc.

talce iron-ore, s.

Min.: A variety of magnetite (q.v.) having weak magnetic properties, in which a part of the protoxide of iron is replaced by magnesia.

talce-schist, s.

Petrol.: A schistose rock consisting wholly or largely of talc, with varying amounts of quartz, and some accessory minerals.

talce-spar, s.

Min.: The same as BREUNERITE (q.v.)

talce-steatite, s.

Min.: The same as TALC (q.v.).

talç-ite, s. [Eng. talç; -ite (Min.).]

Mineralogy:

1. A name given by Thomson to a white muscovite (q.v.) from Wicklow.
2. Kirwan's name for a massive scaly talc.

talç-kÿ, talç-ÿ, a. [Eng. talç; -ÿ.] The same as TALCOSE (q.v.).

talç-oid, s. [Eng. talç; anff. -oid; Ger. talkoid.]

Min.: A snow-white variety of talc occurring in broad folia at Pressnitz, Bohemia. It contained over 67 per cent. of silica. Probably only ordinary talc with disseminated free quartz.

talç-ösc, talç-öus, a. [Eng. talç; -ose, -ous.]

Min. & Petrol.: Partaking of the characters of talc (q.v.).

talçose-granite, s. [PROTOCOL.]

talçose-slate, s. [TALC-SCHIST.]

talç-ö-site, s. [Eng. talçose; suff. -ite (Min.).]

Min.: A mineral occurring in thin veins of scaly structure, resembling talc. Hardness, 1 to 2; sp. gr. 2.46 to 2.5; lustre, pearly; colour, silver-white, greenish, yellowish. Compos.: a hydrated silicate of alumina, probably related to selwynite (q.v.). Occurs at Mount Ada, Heathcote, Victoria.

talç-öus, a. [TALCOSE.]

talç-trip-lite, s. [Eng. talç, and triplite.]

Min.: A variety of triplite (q.v.), in which part of the protoxide of manganese is replaced by lime. Its position as a distinct variety is not however, determined. Occurs in small yellowish grains in the lamellite rock of Horschjöberg, Sweden.

talç (1), s. [TAL.]

II. Greek Antiq.:

The name of a weight and denomination of money among the ancient Greeks, and also applied by Greek writers and their translators to various standard weights and denominations of money among different nations; the weight and value differing in the various nations and at various times. As a weight, those in general use were the Euboic or Attic talent = 56 lbs. 11 oz. Troy, and the Æginetan = about 82½ lbs. The Attic talent contained sixty Attic minæ. As a denomination of money, it was a talent's weight of silver, or a sum of money equivalent to this; so that in our current coin the Attic talent would be worth £243 15s. The great talent of the Romans was equal to £99 6s. 8d., and the little talent to £75. The Hebrew talent (2 Sam. xii. 30) was equal to 93 lbs. 12 oz. avoirdupois; and as a denomination of money it has been variously estimated at from £312 10s. to £396. The marginal note in the A.V. to Matt. xviii. 24, says that "a talent is 750 ounces of silver, which, at five shillings the ounce, is £187 10s." The illustration represents a bronze talent found at Abydos; its weight is about the same as the Attic talent.

¶ For the difference between talent, gift, and intellect, see GIFT and INTELLECT.

Grenville was the head, and Fox his colleague and supporter. It was formed on Jan. 26, 1806, three days after the death of Pitt, and, after undergoing some changes, was dissolved on March 28, 1807. Its nicknames was given from the boast of Mr. Canning and others that it contained all the talent of the country—i. e., of both political parties in the State.

tāl-ent-ōd, a. [Eng. talent (1); -ed.] Furnished or endowed with talents or great mental powers; possessing genius, talents, or abilities.

"While talencing and similar words have no existence, there is a very obvious reason why words of the class of talented are numerous; namely, that we often have occasion to express, through a verb, the ideas of 'possessed of a quality or attribute,' 'endowedness,' &c., than we have to express, through the same part of speech, the ideas of 'communicating a quality or attribute,' 'endowing,' &c., among which ideas are those denoted by the theoretic foundations of the actual talented and the potential talencing, and their cognates."—Henderson: Modern English, p. 78.

¶ This word has often been assailed, and condemned as a "pseudo-participle," having no verb to correspond with it. But many words, universally recognized as good English, are open to the same objection, as gifted, booted, lettered, landed, &c. (See Fitzedward Hall: Modern English, pp. 70-75.)

*tāl-ēr, *tāll-ēr, s. [Eng. tal(s), v.; -er.] One who tells or spreads tales.

"If he be a teller of idle words."—Chaucer: Parson's Tale.

tāl-ēr, s. pl. [Lat., masc. pl. of talis = such.]

Law: Persons of like reputation or standing; persons in the court from whom the sheriff or his clerk makes selections to supply the places of jurors who have been empanelled, but who are not in attendance.

"If by means of challenges, or other causes, a sufficient number of unexceptionable jurors do not appear at the trial, either party may pray a tales, in order to make up a deficiency (the judge being empowered, at the prayer of either party, to award a tales de circumstantibus, of persons present in court, to be joined to the other jurors to try the cause; who are liable, however to the same challenges as the principal jurors. This is usually done till the legal number of twelve be completed."—Blackstone: Comment, bk. III, ch. 12.

¶ To pray a tales:

Law: To pray that the number of jurymen may be completed. A tales was prayed in the celebrated Tichborne case (1873).

"After a great deal of bawling, it was discovered that only ten special jurymen were present. Upon this, Mr. Sergeant Buzarf prayed a tales; the gentleman in black then proceeded to press into the special jury two of the common jurymen."—Dickens: Pickwick, ch. xxxiv.

tales-book, s.

Law: A book containing the names of such as are admitted of the tales.

tales-man, s.

Law: A person summoned to act as a juror from among the bystanders in open court.

"When a sufficient number of persons impanelled, or tales-men, appear, they are then separately sworn in, and truly try the issue between the parties, and a true verdict to give according to the evidence; and hence they are denominated the jury, jurors, and jurors, sc. juratores."—Blackstone: Comment, bk. III, ch. 12.

1. Chem.: A name applied to the harder and less fusible fats, occurring chiefly in the animal kingdom, the most common being beef and mutton tallow. When pure it is white and almost tasteless, and consists of stearin, palmitin, and olein in varying proportions.

2. Manuf. & Comm.: In commerce ox tallow and sheep tallow are commonly distinguished from each other, though much tallow of a nondescript character is sold. Ox tallow at ordinary temperatures is a solid hard fat of yellowish white color, with little taste or smell when fresh, though easily becoming rancid. Sheep tallow is whiter and harder, containing a smaller percentage of olein. It, like ox tallow, easily becomes rancid. A fluid known as tallow oil is obtained from solid tallow by forcing out the olein by pressure. This is a useful lubricant and a valuable material for fine soap making. Tallow is a product of all cattle- and sheep-rearing countries, and is an important article of export from the United States, the Argentine Republic, and Australia. Formerly Russia supplied most of western Europe, but now yields little of the supply. Tallow was formerly principally consumed in candle making, but is at present largely used in soap making, artificial lather making, leather dressing, lubrication, &c. Tallow is of two kinds, each again with two subdivisions, viz., white and yellow candle tallow, and common and Siberian soap tallow. The white candle tallow, when good, is brittle, dry, and clean. The best is brought from Woronesch. Yellow candle tallow, when good, should be clean, dry, hard when broken, and of a fine yellow color throughout. The best soap tallow is brought from Siberia.

† The Tallow-chandlers constitute one of the London Companies. They were incorporated in 1463.

Bot.: Myrica cerifera. [MYRICA-TALLOW.]

tallow-tree, s.

Botany:

1. Stillingia sebifera, a native of China. The leaves are rhomboidal, tapering at the tip, with two glands at the top of the petiole. The fruits are about half an inch in diameter, and have three seeds, which are covered by a kind of wax, used in China for making candles, whence the name tallow tree. They are boiled in large cauldrons, then sufficiently bruised to enable the fat to be removed without breaking the seeds, and pressed. The candles made from this wax are coated with insect wax to prevent them from melting in hot weather. The wood is hard, and used for printing blocks, and the leaves for dyeing black.

2. Vateria indica, a native of the Malabar coast. [VATERIA.]

3. Pentadesma butyracea. [PENTADESMA.]

tāl-lōw, v.t. [TALLOW, s.]

1. To grease or smear with tallow.

"Having thus ript off all our worm-eaten plank and clapt on new, by the beginning of December, 1686, our ship's bottom was sheathed and tallowed."

tāl-wood, s. [Fr. taille = a cutting; taille = cut, and Eng. wood.] Firewood, cut in billets of a certain length.

"Also, if any person... offer or put to sale any tallow, hilles, faggots, or other firewood, &c."—Cutrop's Reports (1800).

tāl-lŷ (1), *taille, *tal-y, s. [Fr. taille = a notch, an incision, a tally or score kept on a piece of wood, from Lat. taleu = a slip of wood; Sp. taja; Port. talka; Ital. taglia.]

I. A notched stick employed as a means of keeping accounts. In buying or selling it was customary for the parties to the transaction to have two sticks, or one stick cleft longitudinally into two parts, on each of which was marked with notches or cuts the number or quantity of goods delivered, or the amount due between debtor and creditor, the seller keeping one stick and the buyer the other. The mode of keeping accounts by tallies was introduced into England by the Normans, 1066. Besides accounts, other records were formerly kept upon notched sticks, as almanacs, in which red-letter days were signified by a large notch, ordinary days by small notches, &c. Such were formerly very common in most European countries. In England tallies were long issued in lieu of certificates of indebtedness to creditors of the State. In 1696, according to Adam Smith, this species of security was at 40 to 60 per cent. discount, and bank-notes 20 per cent. Seasoned sticks of willow or hazel were provided, and these were notched on the edge to represent the amount. Small notches represented pence; larger, shillings; still larger, pounds; proportionately larger and wider, were 10, 100, 1,000 pounds. The stick being now split longitudinally, one piece was given to the creditor, and the other was laid away as a record. When an account was presented for payment, the voucher was compared with the record. When paid, the tally and counter-tally were tied up together, and laid away, accumulating for a long series of years. The system of issuing exchequer tallies was abolished by 25 George III, c. 82; and by 4 and 5 William IV, c. 15, the accumulated tallies were ordered to be destroyed. They were accordingly burnt in a stove in the House of Lords, but the stove being overheated, unfortunately set fire to the panelling of the room, and the Houses of Parliament were destroyed.

TALLY.

"The price of those wooden tallies, which according to an usage handed down to us from a rude age, were given as receipts for sums paid into the Exchequer, had risen."—Macaulay's Eng. Hist., ch. xxii.

* 2. Anything made to correspond with or suit another.

"So right his judgement was cut fit,
And made a tally to him to write."
Butler's Hudibras, III, li. 396.

3. A label or ticket of wood or metal used in gardens for the purpose of bearing either the name of the plant to which it is attached, or a number referring to a catalogue.

4. An abbreviation of tally-shop (q.v.).

5. A certain number of cabbages.

tally-board, s. A small board attached to the life-line thrown by means of a rocket-apparatus to ships wrecked or in danger, when the life-boat cannot reach them.

"The sailors hauled the whip-line on board, and when the tally-board, on which the directions for the method of procedure are printed in English on one side and French on the other, was received, the captain attempted by the light of a lantern to read them."
Scribner's Magazine, Jan., 1890, p. 330.

tally-shop, s. A shop or store at which goods are sold on the tally-system (q.v.).

tally-system, tally-trade, s.

1. A system of trade carried on in many large towns, by which shopkeepers supply goods to their customers on credit, the latter agreeing to pay the price charged by certain weekly instalments. Both parties keep books, in which are entered the particulars of the transaction and the payments of the instalments. The prices charged are usually exorbitant, and the goods of an inferior quality.

2. A system by which drapery goods are supplied to women, chiefly in country districts, and paid for by weekly instalments. (See extract under TALLYMAN, I.)

tāl-lŷ (2), s. [See def.] An abbreviation of Tally-ho (q.v.).

Field, Dec. 4, 1884.

tally-ho, interj. & s. [Norm. Fr. tallis au = to the coppice.]

A. As interj.: The huntsman's cry to urge on his hounds.

B. As substantive:

1. Same as tally-ho, interj.

2. A four-in-hand coach or drag.

tāl-lŷ (1), v. t. & i. [TALLY (1), s.]

A. Transitive:

* I. Ordinary Language:

1. To score with corresponding notches; hence, to make to correspond; to fit, to suit.

"Nor sister either had, nor brother;
They seem'd just tally'd for each other."
Prior: An Epitaph.

2. To reckon up.

"I have not justly tallied up thy inestimable benefits."
Sp. Hall: Breathings of Devout Soul, § 4.

* 3. To repay in like kind.

"Civil law teacheth, that long customs prescribe: divinity, that old things are passed. Moral philosophy, that tallying of injuries is justice."
Sp. Hall: Holy Observations, § 50.

† In this sense perhaps connected with Lat. talis = retaliation.

II. Naut.: To pull aft, as the sheets or lower corners of the main and fore-sail.

B. Intransitive:

1. To fit, to correspond, to agree, to conform, to match.

"Then the mention of the sacrament, as taken in the antient meetings, tallies exactly with Tertullian's account of the Eucharist."
Waterland: Works, vii. 22.

* 2. To deal (cards); a phrase in basset and pharaoh. (Cibber: Careless Husband, iii. l.)

tāl-lŷ (2), v. t. [TALLY (2), s.] To cry tally-ho after.

tāl-lŷ-mān, s. [Eng. tally (1), s., and man.]

1. One who carries on a tally-trade; one who sells goods on credit, to be paid for by instalments.

"We do not know whether the tallyman has ever appeared in fiction before. We may explain that he is a very dangerous trader, who lets his customers—who, it may be said, are always women—have goods unknown to their husbands, to be paid for by weekly instalments."
Spectator, March 14, 1884, p. 863.

2. One who keeps a tally or account; a tallier.

tāl-ma, s. [Prob. after Talma, the French tragedian.] A kind of large cape or short full cloak, worn by ladies, and sometimes by gentlemen.

tāl-mi, s. [Etym. doubtful.] (See compound.)

talmi-gold, s. [ABYSSINIAN-GOLD.]

Tāl-mūd, s. [Heb. תלמוד (Talmudh) = instruction, doctrine; תורה (torah) = to chastise, to train, to teach; cf. תלמיד (talmidh) = a scholar. (1 Chron. xxv. 8.)]

Hebrew Literature: A work in which was committed to writing that "tradition of the elders" which in the time of Jesus was chiefly or exclusively oral (Matt. xv. 2, 3; Mark vii. 5, 9, 13; viii. 9). The early spiritual leaders of the Jewish people, accepting the Old Testament as divine, naturally made it the object of much thought, and attempted to furnish explanations of the more obscure passages, these explanations, if felicitous, being handed down from generation to generation, till they gradually acquired the authority due to inspiration. The Mosaic law contained a multitude of regulations—moral, ceremonial, civil, and criminal—which priests, prophets, lawyers, and other high authorities, interpreted. These were from the first regarded with the veneration with which the decisions of law courts on the meaning of certain statutes are received among modern nations, till at length they were deemed incontrovertible, and attributed to Divine inspiration, and were finally committed to writing, the ultimate product being the Talmud. When it appeared it became a second rule or standard of faith and practice, the first being the Old Testament, and no Jew was required to believe any doctrine or follow any religious, moral, or ceremonial precepts except those recorded in one or other of the two standards. The Talmud had two constituent parts, the text, or Mishna, and the commentary, or Gemara. The Mishna, or explanations and amplifications of Old Testament teaching, began previous to the writing of the books of Chronicles, which allude to their existence. (2 Chron. xiii. 22; xxiv. 27.) They continued till the second century A.D., and were of two kinds: halacha (the rule) and hagada (what is said), but only the first was binding. The germ of the present Mishna proceeded from R. Jehuda Hanasi, A.D. 219, but was preserved only in the memory of scholars, till the destruction of the academies of Palestine in the fourth century, and those of Babylonia in the fifth, showed the necessity of committing it to writing. Hence in the end of the fourth century the Jerusalem, and in the fifth the Babylonian, Talmud was sent forth. The latter was compiled by R. Aasha, who died A.D. 427, and his immediate successors, and is about four times as long as the Jerusalem Talmud. The Talmud consists of six sedharim, or orders, containing sixty-three massicthot, or treatises, and 525 perakim, or chapters. The Mishna is in Hebrew, the Gemara is Aramaean. The contents of the work are miscellaneous. In addition to religion and ethics, there are philosophy, history, &c. Rabbinical Jews set the Talmud on a higher level than the Old Testament. Christians long depreciated it, believing it a mass of exaggeration, puerility, and absurdity. Now, though it is admitted that these charges are true of many passages, the book as a whole is known to be a storehouse of information regarding Judaism in its later development.

tāl-mūd-ic, tāl-mūd-ic-al, a. [Eng. talmud; -ic, -ical.] Of or pertaining to the Talmud; contained in the Talmud.

"These phrases are by the great Broughton called talmudic Greek, when Jewish and talmudical phrases are used in holy writ."
Lightfoot: Miscellanies, p. 68.

tāl-mūd-ist, s. [Eng. talmud; -ist.] One versed or learned in the Talmud.

"He soon attracted the attention of the great Talmudist, Saul Levi Morteira."
G. H. Lewis: History of Philosophy (ed. 1850), II, 165.

tāl-mūd-ist-ic, *tāl-mūd-ist-ick, a. [Eng. talmud; -istic.] Pertaining to the Talmud; contained in the Talmud; talmudic.

"The name Ariel came from the talmudistic mysteries, with which the learned Jews had infected the science."
T. Warton: Hist. Eng. Poetry, III, 478.

* tal-nes, s. [TALINESS.]

tā-lō-, pref. [TALUS.] Of, belonging to, or containing a talus.

talo-scapoid, a.
Anat.: Of or belonging to the talus, or astragalus, and the acaphoid. There is a talo-scapoid ligament.

tāl-ōn, *tāl-ant, *tāl-ent, *tāl-lōn, *tāl-oun, s. [Fr. talon = a heel; Low Lat. taloneum, accus. of talo = a heel; Lat. talus = a heel.]

I. Ord. Lang.: The claw of a bird of prey.

"A bleeding serpent of enormous size."
His talons trussed.—Pope: Homer, Iliad xii. 238.

II. Technically:

1. Arch.: A form of moulding, the same as Ogee (q.v.).

2. Locks.: The shoulder on the bolt against which the key presses in shooting the bolt.

ta'loók, ta'lūk, s. [Hind. ta' aluka = connexion, relationship; a manor.] A large estate; a manor.

ta'loók-dar, ta'lūk-dar, s. [Hind.] The owner of a talook; an estate gentleman; the lord of a manor. (Anglo-Indian.)

"The Oudh talookdars resemble English landlords more closely even than do the zemindars of Bengal. In origin they were not revenue farmers, but territorial magnates, whose influence was derived from feudal authority, military command, or hereditary sway."

tâl-pa, s. [Lat. = a mole, from scalp, root of scalpo = to cut, to carve, to dig; connect with Gr. σκαλώω (skalops),] [SCALOPS.]

Zool.: Mole (q.v.); the typical genus of Talpidae, with eight species. Body stout and thick, furry; head long and pointed, muzzle cartilaginous, protected by snout-bones; eyes very small, no external ears; fore-feet short and wide, with five united toes, armed with trenchant nails for digging; hind-feet with five toes, but weak; tail short. Except in Talpa europæa, the Common Mole, which ranges from England to Japan, the eyes are covered by a membrane; T. caeca is found south of the Alps; T. vogura, T. longirostris, T. moschata, and T. lepraria occur north, and T. leucura and T. micrura south of the Himalayas.

2. Palæont.: From the Miocene of France and the Post-Pliocene of Britain and the Continent.

tâl-pa-vûs, s. [Mod. Lat. talpa], and Lat. avis = an ancestor.]

Palæont.: A genus of Talpidae (q.v.), from the Eocene of North America.

tâl-pi-dæ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. talpa]; Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -idae.]

Zool.: A family of Insectivora, limited to the temperate regions of Europe, Asia, and North America. The species are fossorial, rarely natorial, distinguished from the Soricidae by the presence of zygomatic arches and the form of the teeth. Eyes very small, in some species covered with skin; ears short and hidden by the fur; the fore-limbs modified for digging. There are two sub-families, Myogalinae and Talpinae (q.v.).

2. Palæont.: There are several extinct genera commencing with Talpavus (q.v.), and ending with Palaospalax (q.v.). [TALPA, 2.]

tâl-pi-næ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. talpa]; Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -inae.]

Zool.: The typical sub-family of Talpidae (q.v.) Clavicles and humeri very short and broad; large falciform bone in the manus. There are five genera, divided into two groups.

A. Having front upper incisors much larger than second pair (New World Moles), Scalops, Scapanus, and Condylura.
B. Front incisors scarcely larger than second pair (Old World Moles), Scaptonyx and Talpa.

tâl-tal-ite, s. [After Taltal, Atacama, South America, where found; suff. -ite (Min.)]

Min.: Supposed by David Forbes, who named it, to be a distinct species, but shown by Pisanî to be a tourmaline mixed with oxide of copper and other impurities.

tâl-lus, s. [Lat.]

1. Anat.: The ankle bone. It articulates with the tibia above, the os calcis below, and the scaphoid in front. It receives the weight of the body from the leg. Its convex anterior extremity is termed the head, and the circular groove behind it the neck. Called also the astragalus (q.v.).

2. Arch.: The slope or inclination of any work, as of a wall inclined on its face, either by decreasing in thickness toward the summit or by leaning it against a bank, as a retaining or breast-wall.

3. Fort.: The slope of a work, as a bastion, rampart, or parapet. (In this sense written also talut.)

4. Geol.: A sloping heap of rocky fragments broken off from the face of a steep rock by the action of the weather, and accumulating at its base. So called from its resemblance to a talus in fortification. [3.]

5. Surg.: A variety of club-foot, in which the heel rests on the ground, and the toes are drawn towards the leg. (Goodrich.)

tâl-lût, s. [TALUS, 3.]

* tâl-vaş, s. [Etym. doubtful.] A kind of wooden buckler or shield of an oblong form, bent on each side, and rising in the middle. It was in use in the fourteenth century.

* tal-wood, s. [TALLWOOD.]

tâm-a-bil-y-tý, tâme-a-bil-y-tý, s. [Eng. tamable; -ity.] The quality or state of being tamable; tamableness.

† The tamability of mankind.—S. Smith: Lectures, 1811.

tâm-a-ble, tâme-a-ble, a. [Eng. tam(e); -able.] Capable of being tamed or of being reclaimed from a wild or savage state.

* tâm-a-ble-nëss, s. [Eng. tamable; -ness.] The quality or state of being tamable; tamability.

ta-mal', ta-ma'-lë (pl. ta-ma-les), s. [Sp.] A mixture of meat, crushed corn and red pepper, sold by street vendors in Mexico and to some extent in this country. It is served in corn-husk, after being dipped in oil and steamed.

ta-mân-du-g, s. [Native name.]

Zoology:

1. A genus of Myrmecophagidae, from the forests of South and Central America. In anatomical structure the genus is closely akin to Myrmecophaga (q.v.), but the head is less elongated, the fur short and bristly, the tail tapering and prehensile, the top of the terminal part and the under side throughout naked and scaly. The fifth toe on the fore feet is concealed within the skin. Only one species has been distinguished, Tamandua tetradactyla; but as different individuals vary greatly in coloration, it is not improbable that other species exist.

2. Tamandua tetradactyla, an Ant-eater, smaller than the Great Ant-eater or Ant Bear, from which it differs in being arboreal. The usual colour is yellowish-white, with a broad black lateral band, which covers nearly the whole of the side of the body.

tâm-an-oir (oir as wâr), s. [See def.]

Zool.: The native name of Myrmecophaga jubata. [ANT-BEAR.]

tâm-an-û, s. [Native name.]

Bot. & Comm.: A heavy, green resin brought from the Society Islands. It is derived from Calophyllum Inophyllum.

tâm-a-ra, s. [E. Ind.] A term applied to a spice consisting of equal parts of cinnamon, cloves, and coriander seeds, with half the quantity of aniseed and fennel seed all powdered.

tâm-a-räck, s. [The Canadian Indian name.]

Bot.: The American or Black Larch, Larix penulula or americana, called also Abies penulula. It has weak and drooping branches, which sometimes take root, forming a natural arch. The leaves are clustered and deciduous, the cones oblong, with numerous spreading scales. It constitutes a feature of the forests in Canada and the Northern United States. Its timber is valuable, but less so than the larch.

tâm-a-ri-câ-çë-ø, s. pl. [Lat. tamariz, genit. tamaricis]; fem. pl. adj. suff. -aceæ.]

Bot.: Tamarisks; an order of Hypogynous Exogens, alliance Violales. Shrubs or herbs with rod-like branches. Leaves alternate, scale-like, entire, usually pitted; flowers in close spikes or racemes; calyx four or five-parted, persistent, imbricated in veneration; petals inserted into the base of the calyx, imbricated in aestivation; stamens equal in number to the petals, or twice as many, distinct or monadelphous; styles three, ovary superior. Fruit capsular, three-valved, one-celled, many seeds on three placentas. Found in the Northern Hemisphere of the Old World. Known genera three, species forty-three. (Lindley.)

tâm-a-rin, s. [Native name.]

Zool.: A popular name for any species of the genus Midas (q.v.). The body is long and slender, clothed with soft hair, and the tail, which is non-prehensile, is about twice the length of the trunk. They are very restless and active, but are easily tamed, and are male pets of by the natives of Central America. [MARMOSÉT.]

tâm-a-rind, *tâm-a-rinde, s. [Fr. tamarind = a small, soft, and dark-red Indian date (Cotgrave, in Skelt); tamarin = the fruit of the tamarind, tamariner = the tree itself (Littre); Sp. & Ital. tamarindo; Port. tamarindo, tamarhino; Arab. tamar-hindî = the Indian date; into which tree the tamarind has no affinity.]

1. Bot.: Tamarindus indica. Leaves abruptly pinnate, with many pairs of small leaflets; flowers in racemes; calyx straw-coloured; petals yellow, streaked with red, filaments purple, anthers brown. It is an evergreen tree, eighty feet high by twenty-five in circumference, cultivated in India as far north as the Jhelum, and very largely planted in avenues and "topes." The wood, which is yellowish white, sometimes with red streaks, is hard and close-grained. It weighs about 83 lbs per cubic foot, is highly prized, but is very difficult to work, and is used in India for turning wheels, mallets, plaves, furniture, rice-pounders, oil and sugar mills, &c. It furnishes excellent charcoal for the manufacture of gunpowder. The pulp of the legume, pressed in syrup is a delicious confection, and constitutes part of the tamarinds of English shops. The flowers and fruit are used in India as an astringent or as a mordant in dyeing, especially with safflower; the leaves furnish a yellow dye. The seeds yield a clear, bright, fluid oil, with an odour like that of the linseed; their powder mixed with thin glue makes a strong cement for wood. The West Indian and South American variety of T. indica (var. occidentalis) has legumes only three times as long as broad, whereas the Indian tree has them six times as long.

2. Comm.: The tamarind sold in England are chiefly West Indian tamarinds with their pulp preserved in sugar. They differ from the Black or East Indian tamarinds of which the preserved pulp is black.

3. Pharm.: In modern pharmacy tamarinds are used as gentle laxatives; they are refrigerant from the acids which they contain, and, when infused, constitute a cooling drink in fevers. They enter into the Confectio Senne. In India the seeds are given in dysentery, &c.; in the Mauritius a decoction of the bark is given in asthma.

tamarind-fish, s. A preparation of a kind of East Indian fish with the acid pulp of the tamarind fruit, much esteemed as a breakfast relish in India.

tamarind-plum, s.

Bot.: Dialium indicum, one of the Cydonetree. The legume has a delicate agreeable pulp, less acid than that of the tamarind.

tâm-a-rin'-dûs, s. [TAMARIND.]

tā-mar-ite, s. [After the Tamar mines, Devon, where it was supposed to have been first found; suff. -ite (Min.).]
Min.: The same as CHALCOPHYLLITE (q.v.).

tām'-a-ris, s. [Lat. = a tamarisk; said to be from the Tamaris (now the Tambr), a river of Spain, along which tamarisks abound.]

Bot.: Tamarisk; the typical genus of Tamaricaceae or Tamariscineae. Sepals four to five, equal, distinct; petals four to five, distinct, or united at the base; stamens four to ten; styles three or four; stigmas distinct, sessile, feathery; capsule one-seeded, three-valved; seeds numerous, without a beak; papose. Known species twenty; all from the eastern hemisphere. They are shrubs growing gregariously in bushy clumps, along river banks or basins, &c., in desert tracts, as along the banks of the Suez Canal. T. gallica the French, called also T. anglica, the English tamarisk, an evergreen shrub or small tree, five to ten feet high, with very slender and feathery branches, minute, amplexicaul, adpressed, acute leaves, and lateral, somewhat panicked spikes of white or pink flowers, is found on the south and east coasts of England, but is an alien. It is wild on the Continental European shores of the Atlantic and the Mediterranean, and in Western Asia and India. Its bark is slightly bitter and astringent. This species, and Tamarix africana, if burnt, yield much sulphate of soda. T. mannifera produces the manna of Mount Sinai, which, however, is not a natural exudation from the tree, but arises from a puncture of an insect, Coccus mannipara. T. dioica and T. articulata (called also T. orientalis) are found on the banks of rivers and on sea coasts throughout India. The former yields a gum which appears nodular, and is transparent in the central speck of each tear, while opaque on the circumference. The latter also furnishes a small quantity of gum. The galls and bark of T. indica, T. dioica, T. Feras, and T. orientalis are used in tanning and as an auxiliary in dyeing. They are also used medicinally as astringents. Their action is due to the tannic and gallic acids which they contain.

Byron: Childe Harold, ll. lxxii.

tām-bou-rine, tam-bou-rin, tam-bu-rin, tam-bu-rine, s. [Fr. tambourin, dimin. from tambour = a drum, a tambour.]

Music:

I. An ancient pulsatile instrument of the drum class, popular among all European people, but particularly those of the south. The Biscayan and Italian peasantry employ it on every festal occasion. It is formed of a hoop of wood, sometimes of metal, over which is stretched a piece of parchment or skin; the sides of the hoop are pierced with holes, in which are inserted pieces of metal in pairs, called jingles. Small bells are sometimes fastened on to the outer edge of the hoop. It is sounded by being struck with the knuckles, or by drawing the fingers or thumb over the skin, which produces what is called "the roll," a peculiar drone mingled with the jingle of the bells or pieces of metal.

"Each her ribbon'd tambourine Flinging on the mountain sod."
Matthews Arnold: Empedocles on Etna, ll.

2. A stage dance formerly popular in France. It was of a lively measure, and accompanied with a pedal bass in imitation of the drone caused by rubbing the thumb over the skin of a tambourine.

táne, pa. par. of v. [TAKEN.]

táng (1), *tongge, s. [O. Dut. tanger = sharp, tart; M. H. G. zanger = sharp, sharp-tasted.]

1. Lit.: A strong taste or flavour, especially a taste of something extraneous to the thing itself.

"It is said of the beet oyl that it hath no taste, that is, no tang."—Fuller: Worthies; England.

2. Fig.: Specific flavour or quality; distinctive tinge, taint, or the like; a twang.

"According to that of Euripides, which yet has a tang of prophaneness."—Cudworth: Intell. System, p. 57.

*táng (2), s. [An imitative word; cf. ting.] A sound, a tone; a twang or sharp sound.

"For she had a tongue with a tang. Would cry to a sailor, Go hang."—Shakespeare: Tempest, II. 2.

táng (3), *tange, *tongge, s. [Icel. tangt = a spit or projection of land; a tang; tóng (genit. tangar) = a smith's tongs; tengja = to fasten.]

1. The shank of a knife, chisel, file, &c., which is inserted in the haft.

2. The projecting part of the breech of a musket, which goes into the stock.

3. The part of a sword-blade to which the hilt is fastened.

4. The tongue of a buckle.

tang-chisel, s. A chisel with a tang for insertion in a handle; in contradistinction to a socket-chisel, which has a hollow tang to receive the handle.

tang-fish, s. The seal. (Shetland.)

táng (4), s. [TANOLE.] Various kinds of seaweed (Laminaria digitata, Fucus nodulosus).

"Calling it the sea of weeds, or flag, or rush, or tang."—Sp. Richardson: Choice Observations, p. 11.

táng, v. t. & i. [TANG (2), s.]

A. Trans.: To cause to sound; to utter loudly. (Shakespeare: Twelfth Night, II. 5.)

B. Intrans.: To ring. (Shakespeare: Twelfth Night, III. 4.)

¶ To tang bees: To strike two pieces of metal together, and so to produce a loud sound, to induce a swarm of bees to settle.

tán'-gá-lúng, s. [Native name.]

Zool.: Viverra tangalunga, from Java. It is about thirty inches in length, of which the tail constitutes one-third. Ground colour yellowish-gray, striped and dotted with black.

*tán'-gènce, s. [Lat. tangens = touching.] [TANGENT.] A touching; tangency.

¶ Point of tangency: The point of contact of a tangent line.

tán'-gèng-cý, s. [Eng. tangent(t); -cy.] The quality or state of being tangent; a contact or touching.

¶ Problem of tangencies: A branch of the geometrical analysis, the general object of which was to describe a circle passing through given points, and touching straight lines or circles given in position, the number of data being always limited to three.

tán'-gènt, a. & s. [Lat. tangens, pr. par. of tango = to touch.]

A. As adj.: Touching; in geometry, touching in a single point: as, a tangent line, tangent curves, &c.

B. As substantive:

1. Geom.: A straight line which meets or touches a circle or curve in one point, and which, being produced, will not cut it. In Euclid (III. 16, Cor.) it is proved that any line drawn at right angles to the diameter of a circle at its extremity is a tangent to the circle.

2. Trig.: The tangent of an arc or angle is a straight line, touching the circle of which the arc is a part at one extremity of the arc, and meeting the diameter passing through the other extremity; or it is that portion of a tangent drawn at the first extremity of an arc, and limited by a secant drawn through the second extremity.

The tangent is always drawn through the initial extremity of the arc, and is reckoned positive upwards, and consequently, negative downwards. The tangent of an arc or angle is also the tangent of its supplement. The arc and its tangent have always a certain relation to each other, and when the one is given in parts of the radius, the other can always be computed by means of an infinite series. Tables of tangents for every arc from 0° to 99°, as well as of sines, cosines, &c., are computed and formed into tables for trigonometrical purposes. Two curves are tangent to each other at a common point, when they have a common rectilinear tangent at this point. A tangent plane to a curved surface is the limit of all secant planes to the surface through the point. The point is called the point of contact. Two surfaces are tangent to each other when they have, at least, one point in common; through which, if any number of planes be passed, the sections cut out by each plane will be tangent to each other at the point. This point is called the point of contact. Another definition is this: Two surfaces are tangent to each other when they have a common tangent plane at a common point. This point is the point of contact.

TANGENT. A A A A, Tangents of the circle; B F, Tangent of the arc B C; or of the angle B D C. E F is also tangent of the supplement of the angle B D C, and of the supplement B D O of the angle B D C.

¶ (1) Artificial tangents: Tangents expressed by logarithms.

(2) Method of tangents: The name given to the calculus in its early period. When the equation of a curve is given, and it is required to determine the tangent at any point, this is called the direct method of tangents, and when the subtangent to a curve at any point is given, and it is required to determine the equation of the curve, this is termed the inverse method of tangents. These terms are synonymous with the differential and integral calculus.

(3) Natural tangents: Tangents expressed by natural numbers.

(4) To go (or fly) off at a tangent: To break off suddenly from one course of action, line of thought, or the like, and go on to something else.

"From that lady his mind wandered, by a natural process, to the dingy counting-house of Dodson and Fog. From Dodson and Fog it flew off at a tangent to the very centre of the history of the queer client."—Dickens: Pickwick, ch. xxii.

tangent-compass, s. The same as TANGENT-GALVANOMETER (q.v.).

tangent-galvanometer, s. A form of galvanometer in which the length of the astatic needle employed is so short, in comparison with the diameter of the surrounding copper ring through which the current to be measured is passed, that the intensities of currents may be regarded as proportional to the tangents of the angles of deflection of the needle. The tangents in this case serve as a direct measure of the comparative intensities.

tangent-plane, s. A plane which touches a curved surface, as a sphere, cylinder, &c.

tangent-sailing, s.

Navig.: The same as Middle-latitude sailing. [MIDDLE.]

tangent-scale, s.

Ordn.: A species of breech-sight for cannon. Its base has a curvature corresponding to the circumference of the breech of the gun, and its face is cut into steps corresponding to angles of elevation. The height for each step is found by multiplying the natural tangent of the elevation in degrees by the distance between the base-ring and muzzle-sight.

tangent-screw, s. An endless screw tangentially attached to the index-arm of an instrument of precision, enabling a delicate motion to be given to the arm after it has been clamped to the limb, and permitting angular measurements to be made with greater exactness than could be done were the movement entirely effected by hand.

tán'-gèn'-tial (ti as sh), a. [Eng. tangent; -tal.] Of or pertaining to a tangent; in the direction of a tangent.

"Give the heavy planets their tangential motion."—Search: Light of Nature, vol. II., pt. II., ch. xxii.

tangential-force, s.

1. The same as CENTRIFUGAL-FORCE.

2. Mech.: A force which acts upon a wheel in the direction of a tangent to the wheel, and this is the direction in which motion is communicated between wheels and pinions or from one wheel to another.

tangential-plane, s. A tangent-plane (q.v.).

tán'-gèn'-tial-ly (t as sh), adv. [Eng. tangential; -ly.] In a tangential manner; in direction of a tangent.

tán'-gér'-íne, s. [See def.] An esteemed small-fruited variety of orange from Tangiera.

tán'-ghín, s. [TANOHINIA.]

1. The poison of Tanohinia venenifera.
2. That tree itself. [TANOHINIA.]

ból, bóy; pòut, jòwí; cat, çell, chorus, çhin, bench; go, gem; thin, this; sin, as; expect, Xenophon, exist. ph = ç -clan, -tian = çhan. -tion, -sion = shün; -fion, -gion = zhün. -cions, -tious, -sious = shüs. -bia, -die, &c. = bèl, dèl.

tân-hîn'-i-g, s. [From tanghin, the Madagascar name of Tanghinia venenifera. See def.]

Bot. : Tanghin; a genus of Plumieria. Corolla salver-shaped, the tube clavate, the throat five-toothed, anthers subsessile, fruit a drupe, with one or two seeds. Only known species, Tanghinia venenifera, called also Cerbera Tanghin, the Ordeal-tree (q.v.). Leaves dense, clustered towards the ends of the branches, somewhat thick, about six inches long, alternate, lanceolate, smooth. Flowers in terminal cymes, the tube of the corolla green, hairy, and closed at the mouth by five green scales; lobes of the corolla rose-coloured. It is the kernel of the fruit which is the very poisonous part.

tân-gi-bil'-i-ty, s. [Eng. tangible; -ity.] The quality or state of being tangible or perceptible to the touch or sense of feeling.

"Tangibility and impenetrability, were elsewhere made by him the very essence of body."—Cudworth: Intel. System, p. 70.

tân-gi-ble, a. [Fr., from Lat. tangibilis, from tango = to touch.]

I. Literally:
1. Perceptible to the touch; tactile.
"By this sense [touch] the tangibilia qualities of bodies are discerned: as hard, soft, smooth, rough, dry, wet, clammy, and the like."—Locke: Elements Nat. Philos., ch. XI.

II. Figuratively:
1. Capable of being possessed or realized; real: as, tangible security.
2. Readily apprehensible by the mind; clear, evident.

"It promised a tangible gain to the peasantry."—Century Magazine, June, 1853, p. 233.

tangible-property, s.
Law: Corporeal property. (Wharton.)

tân-gi-ble-ness, s. [Eng. tangible; -ness.] The quality or state of being tangible; tangibility.

tân-gi-bly, adv. [Eng. tangible(e); -ly.] In a tangible manner; so as to be perceptible to the touch.

tâng-îe, s. [TANG (t), s.] A water-spirit of the Orkneys, which appeared sometimes as a little horse, at other times as a man covered with sea-weed.

Tân'-giôr, s. [See def.]
Geog.: A fortified town of Morocco a short distance south-west of Gibraltar.

Tangier-pea, s.
Bot.: Lathyrus tingitanus.

Tân'-giôr-ine, s. [TANGIERINE.]

tân'-gle, *tan-gell, v.t. & t. [TANGLE, s.]

A. Transitive:
1. To unite or knit together in a confused or involved manner; to ravel; to interweave or interlace, as threads, so as to make it difficult to unravel.
"His speech was like a tangled chain."
Shakspeare: Midsummer Night's Dream, v.

2. To ensnare, to entrap, to catch, to entangle.
"And well th' Impostor knew all lures and arts That Lucifer'er taught to tangle hearts."
Moore: Veiled Prophet of Khorasan.

3. To embroil, to embarrass, to involve, to complicate.
"Thet have bene tangled with a certain foolish and enored vile superstition."—Bp. Gardner: Of True Obedience, fol. 5.

B. Intrans.: To be or become entangled or ravelled.

tangle-foot, s. A cant term for whiskey, especially that of poor quality. (U. S.) tân'-gle, s. [A frequent, from tang = sea-weed; Dan. tang; Sw. tång; Icel. hang = kelp or bladder-wrack; thöngull = sea-weed; Ger. tang = sea-weed.]

I. Ordinary Language:
1. One or two species of sea-weed belonging to the genus Laminaria (q.v.). [H. 1.]

"The young stalks of Laminaria digitata and saccharina are eaten under the name of tangle."—Lindley: Vegetable Kingdom.

2. A confused heap or knot of threads or other things interwoven so as not to be easily disengaged.
"He leading, swiftly rolf'd
In tangles."—Milton: P. L., l. 332.

3. Any perplexity or embarrassment.
4. A tall, lank person; any long, dangling thing. (Scotch.)

II. Technically:
1. Botany:

(1) Laminaria digitata. It has a broad frond one to five feet long, cut into a variable number of segments, and sporanges in flat patches on the extremities of the digitations. Very common on the rocky coasts of Britain.

† (2) Laminaria saccharina. It has a riband-shaped frond two to twelve feet long, and sporanges, the situation of which is indicated by a longitudinal brown mark in the centre of the frond. Occurring with the former species. [LAMINARIA.]

2. Naut. (P.L.): A contrivance used in dredging. In a coarse form it has long been used in the sponge and coral fisheries, consisting of a bar supported on runners, and serving to drag after it a series of masses of hemp, each of which is a sort of mop. The fibres of the hemp entangle the smaller crustaceans, and many of the more minute and delicate forms of marine life, without breaking or injuring them as the dredge is apt to.

tangle-fish, s. [NEEDLE-FISH.]

tangle-picker, s.
Ornith.: Streptilas interpres, the Turnstone (q.v.).

"It . . . feeds on the smaller crustaceans, and the soft-bodied animals inhabiting thin shells, turning over stones, and searching among sea-weed for its food: whence its appropriate Norfolk name of Tangle-picker."—Farrall: British Birds (ed. 4th), l. 11, 294.

tangle-wrack, s.
Bot.: The genus Laminaria (q.v.).

tân'-gled (le as el), a. [Eng. tangle(e); -ed.] Involved; twisted or knit together confusedly; intricate.

"Up springs from yonder tangled thorn,
A stag more white than mountain snow."
Scott: The Chase, xiv.

tân'-gling, pr. par. or a. [TANGLE, v.]

tân'-gling-ly, adv. [Eng. tangling; -ly.] In a tangling manner; so as to tangle, entangle, or embarrass.

tân'-gly, a. [Eng. tangle(e); -y.]
1. Knotted, entangled, intricate.
2. Covered with tangle or sea-weed.

"Panting, with eyes averted from the day, Proue, helpless, on the tangly beach he lay."
Falconer: Shipwreck, III.

tân'-gram, s. [Chinese.] A Chinese toy used sometimes in primary schools as a means of instruction. It consists of a square of thin wood or other material, cut into seven pieces of various shapes, as triangle, square, parallelogram, &c., which pieces are capable of being combined in various ways so as to form a great variety of figures.

tân'gs, s. pl. [TONGS.] (Scotch.)

tân'gue, a. [A French form of the native name.] [TANBEC.]

tân'-gum, tân'-ghâm tân'-ghân, s. [Thibetian.]

Zool.: Equus varius, a variety or sub-variety of the Horse (Equus caballus). It is considered by Colonel Hamilton Smith to be the primeval pied-bald stock of Thibet. It occurs in Thibet, and, according to Hodgson, in China.

tân'-i-ër, tân'-ni-ër, s. [Etym. doubtful.]
Bot.: Caladium sagittifolium. [CALADIUM, EDDOES.]

tân'-ist, s. [Irish tanaiste = the second in rank, the presumptive or apparent heir to a prince, a lord; tán = a country, region, territory.] One of a family from which the chiefs of certain Celtic races were chosen by election; usually applied to the actual holder of the lands and honours, and frequently to his chosen successor. [TANISTRAY.]

"The chieftains and the tanists, though drawn from the principal families, were not hereditary, but were established by election."—Hume: Hist. Eng. (an. 1612).

tân'-ist-rý, s. [Eng. tanist; -ry.] A mode of tenure among various Celtic tribes, according to which the tanist or holder of lands or honours had only a life estate in them, and his successor was appointed by election. According to this system the right of succession was hereditary in the family, but elective in the individual. The primitive intenion seems to have been that the inheritance should descend to the most worthy of the blood and name of the deceased. This was in reality giving it to the strongest, and the practice often occasioned bloody wars in families.

"The Irish hold their lands by tanistry, which is no more than a personal estate for his life-time that is tanist, by reason he is admitted thereunto by election."—Sponser: State of Ireland.

tân'-nite, s. [Etym. doubtful.] The trade name of a cement of emery and some binding material, used as a compound for grinding wheels, disks, laps, and in other forms.

tanite-shaper, s. A device for shaping and sharpening moulding-bits, cutters, saws, and other wood-working tools.

tân'k (1), s. [Port. tangue = a tank, a pond. Tank and stank are the same word; Sp. estangue; O. Fr. estanc; Fr. étang; Prov. estanc, stanc; Ital. stagno, from Lat. stagnum = a pool.] [STANK, s., STAGNANT.]

1. A cistern or vessel of large size to contain liquids; specifically—

(1) That part of a tender which contains the water. The tank varies in size, according to the power of the engine.

(2) A reservoir from which the tank of the tender is filled.

(3) A cistern for storing water on board ship.

(4) The cistern of a gas-holder, in which the lower edge of the inverted chamber is beneath the water-surface, forming a seal for the gas.

(5) The term is also applied to a chamber or vessel in which a liquid is stored for dispensing or occasional use, as with oil, molasses, vinegar, wine, spirits, and other articles kept in stock, for sale in measured quantities.

2. A reservoir of water for irrigation or other purposes. (East Indies.)

tank-car, s.
Rail.-engin.: A large tank mounted on a platform truck, for carrying petroleum or other liquid.

tank-engine, tank-locomotive, s.
Rail.-engin.: An engine having a tank or tanks enabling it to carry a supply of water sufficient for its own consumption without a tender. Such are used for yard-engines, for side-lines of limited length, and for ascending grades with moderate loads. The boiler and machinery are carried on the driving-wheels, and the variable weight of water and fuel on the tank-truck.

tank-iron, s. Plate-iron, thicker than sheet or stove-pipe iron, but thinner than boiler-plate.

tank-valve, s.
Rail.-engin.: A form of valve used in locomotive water-supply tanks, for admitting water to the discharge-pipe.

tank-vessel, s. Same as TANKER.

tank-worm, s.
Zool. (Pl.): The Guinea worm in a certain stage of its development, when the young have been set free from the body of their parent and inhabit the "tanks" so common in India. It is supposed that it penetrates the body of bathers when it is very minute.

tân'k (2), s. [Native name.]

1. A small East Indian dry measure of about 240 grains weight.

2. A weight for pearls in Bombay of 72 grains. (Simmonds.)

tân'k (3), s. [TANG (3), s.] The end of a file, chisel, &c., which is inserted into the handle; a tang.

tân'k (4), s. [Etym. doubtful.]
Bot.: Pastinaca sativa.

tân'-ka, tân'-kî-â, s. [Native Chinese name.]

1. A kind of boat at Canton, Macao, &c., rowed by women. It is about 25 feet long.

2. A woman who rows in such a boat.

tân'-kard, s. & a. [O. Fr. tanquard, perhaps formed by metathesis, from Lat. cantharus; Gr. κάνθαρος (kantharos) = a tankard; O. Dut. tanckaert; Irish tancaird.]

A. As substantive:
1. A large vessel for liquors, especially a tân, tât, fâre, amidst, whât, fâll, father; wê, wêt, hère, camêl, hêr, thêre; pine, pît, sîre, sir, marine; go, pôtt, er, wôre, wôlf, wôr'k, whô, sôn; mûta, cûb, cûre, ûnite, cûr, rûle, fûll; trý, Sýrian. æ, œ = ô; ey = â; qu = kw.

large drinking vessel with a cover, made of pewter, gold, silver, &c.

2. Specif.: A vessel containing a pint; half tankard, or small tankard, being used for one containing half-a-pint.

 B. As adj.: Of or pertaining to a tankard; hence, convivial, festive, jovial. (Milton.)

 tankard-bearer, s. A person who, when London was very imperfectly supplied with water, carried water about in large tankards holding two or three gallons from the conduits and pumps in the streets.

tankard-turnip, s.
Hort., &c.: Brassica rapa oblonga, a variety or sub-variety of turnip rising high above the ground.

tank'ér, s. A steamship built with tanks to convey petroleum in bulk. (U.S.) tán-ki'-s, s. [TANKA.]

tánk'-ite, s. [Blým. doubtful. Sent to Breithaupt under this name.]

Min.: A massive mineral found at Arendal, Norway, and said to be related to chistolite, but Des Cloizeaux and Pisani (the former from its optical characters, the latter from its chemical composition) refer it to Anorthite (q.v.).

 tánk'-líng, s. [TANG, v.] A tinkling.

 tán'-líng, s. [Eng. tán; dimin. suff. -líng.] One tanned or scorched by the heat of the sun.

"To be still hot summer's tannings, and The shrinking slaves of winter."
Shakespeare, Cymbeline, iv. 4.

tán'-ná, thán'-ná, thán'-s, s. [Hind. thana; Mahratta thane = a station.] A police station; a military post. (East Indies.) tán'-ná-ble, a. [Eng. tán; -able.] Capable of being tanned.

tán'-ná-dar, thán'-e-dar, s. [Hind. thane-dar.] The keeper or commandant of a tanna; a petty police officer. (East Indies.)

 tán'-nage (ag as íg), s. [Eng. tán; -age.] The act, operation, or result of tanning; a tanning.

"They should have got his cheek fresh tannage."
Browning: Flight of the Duchess.

tán-nás-pí'-ic, a. [Eng. tannic; -ic. Mod. Lat. aspídium, and suff. -ic.] A term applied to tannic acid derived from the male fern.

tannaspídio-acid, s.
Chem.: $C_{28}H_{32}O_{11}$ (?). A brown, shining, amorphous mass, found in the root of the male fern. It is insoluble in water, ether, oil of turpentine, and fixed oils, but very soluble in strong alcohol and in warm acetic acid. Ferric chloride colours the alcoholic solution green, and on adding ammonia a greenish powder is precipitated.

tán'-nate, s. [Eng. tannic; -ate.] Chem.: A salt of tannic acid.

tán-né-cor-té-pí'-nio, a. [CORTEPINTAN-NIC.]

tán'-nón-ite, s. [After the Tannenbaum mines, Saxony; suff. -ite (Min.)]

Min.: A bright metallic mineral of a tin-white colour, crystallizing in the orthorhombic system. Compos.: sulphur, 13.1; bismuth, 62.0; copper, 18.9, the resulting formula being $CuS + Bi_2S_3$.

tán'-nór (1), s. [Eng. tán, v.; -er.] One whose occupation is to tan hides, or convert them into leather by the use of tan.

"The hollows (to which a gun-barrel served for a pipe) had no other inconvenience, than that of being somewhat strong-scented from the impregnation of the tanner's work."—Anson: Voyages, bk. III, ch. III.

tanner's bark, s. Bark of various trees used by tanners, spec. oak bark. [BARK (2), B. 3.]

tanner's waste, s. Hide-cuttings.

tán'-nór (2), s. [Gipsy tano = little.] A slang expression for sixpence. (Dickens: Martin Chuzzlewit, ch. xxxvii.) tán'-nór-ý, s. [Eng. tán; -ery.]

1. A place where the operations of tanning are carried on.
2. The art or practice of tanning.

tán'-nic, a. [Eng. tannic; -ic.] Pertaining to or derived from oak bark.

tannic-acid, s.
Chem.: Tannin. A term applied to certain astringent substances occurring in the bark and other parts of plants, and widely distributed, in one form or another, throughout the vegetable kingdom. They are mostly amorphous, have a rough but not sour taste, a slight acid reaction, and colour ferric salts dark blue or green. Their most characteristic reaction is that of forming insoluble compounds with gelatin, solving muscular fibre, skin, &c., which then acquires the property of resisting putrefaction, as in the tanning of leather.

Tannic acid of the Oak:
Chem.: $C_{27}H_{32}O_{17}$. Gallotannic acid, extracted from nut-galls by long maceration of the powdered substance with a mixture of four parts of ether and one part of alcohol. It forms a slightly yellowish, porous mass, very soluble in water, less so in alcohol, slightly soluble in ether, reddens litmus, and possesses a pure astringent taste. It forms neutral and basic salts, the latter absorbing oxygen from the air and becoming brown.

tán'-ní-ér, s. [TANIERA.] tán'-ní-gó-nám'-ic, a. [Eng. tannic; Gr. γέννα (genna) = to produce, and Eng. amic.] Derived from or containing tannic acid and ammonia.

tannigenamic-acid, s. [GALLAMIC-ACID.] tán'-nín, s. [Fr., from Mod. Lat. tanninum.] [TAN, TANNIC-ACID.]

tán'-níng, pr. par. a., & a. [TAN, v.]
A. & B. As pr. par. & particip. adj.: (See the verb).

"There was a tanning company, which promised to furnish leather superior to the best that was brought from Turkey."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xix.

C. As substantive:

I. Lit.: The art, practice, or process of converting raw hides and skins into leather by combining with the substance of the skin any other compound which has the property of rendering it impertrescible and elastic. The agent most generally employed is a soluble vegetable extract termed tannin, which forms insoluble compounds with the albumen, gluten, gelatin, and other components of the skin. Another class of agents which fortify the fibrous portions of skins against the joint attack of warmth, air, and moisture are minerals, which seem to act as preservative salts on the gelatinous-fibrous structure of the skin. Such are alum and salt, and copperas. The larger and heavier skins, as those of buffaloes, oxen, or the like, are technically known as hides; those of smaller animals, as of sheep, calves, &c., are skins. The skins are first stripped of the hair, wool, and fleshy parts by steeping in pits containing lime-water of various strengths. They are then washed in water, scraped to get rid of adhering lime, the ears and projecting parts cut off, and are then ready for the tan-pits—wooden-lined vats, whose tops are level with the ground. Into these the skins and the ground bark, or ooze previously extracted therefrom, are put. The skins are usually placed in horizontal layers, but are sometimes suspended vertically. In the process of handling, the hides are taken out with blunt-pointed, long-handled hooks, placed one over another, on a sloping rack over an adjacent pit, and permitted to drain for one or two hours. It is common to put the skins at first into nearly spent ooze, and transfer them successively to stronger oozes. Those in which the tanning is effected are called hander-liquor; stronger oozes, used for giving the bloom on the surface, are termed layer-liquor.

"The Lord Treasurer Bureleigh (who always consented artificers in their own art) was indoctrinated by a cobbler in the true tanning of leather."—Fuller: Worthies; Middlesex.

II. Figuratively:
1. Appearance or hus of a brown colour produced on the skin by the action of the sun.
2. A thrashing, a flogging. (Slang.) tán'-nín-gén'-ic, a. [Eng. tannin; Or. γέννα (genna), and suff. -ic.] Containing tannic acid.

tanningenic-acid, s. [CATECHINE.] tán'-nóm'-é-tér, s. [Eng. tannin; o connect., and meter.] A hydrometer for determining the strength of tanning liquor.

tán'-réc, s. [Native name.]

Zool.: Cenestes coarctatus, a small nocturnal insectivorous mammal from Madagascar and the neighbouring islands. It is about fifteen inches long, of which nearly one-third is occupied by the elongated head; the body is covered with bristles, hairs, and spines, the latter forming a sort of collar round the neck. General colour, tawny; in the young there are said to be longitudinal yellow streaks, which disappear with age. They feed principally on earthworms, for which they root with their pointed snouts, like pigs. Their flesh is said to resemble that of the sucking-pig, but to have a musky odour. [CENTERES, SPREAKED-TANREC.] tán'-sý, *tán'-zey, s. [Etym. unknown (Lilke), doubtful (Sir J. Hooker); O. Fr. athanasie; Fr. tanaeé, tanaisie; Low Lat. athanasia; the name under which the tansy was sold in the shops in Lyle's time; Gr. άθανασία (athanasia) = immortality, a privative, and θάνατος (thanatos) = death. (Frior.)]

1. Bot.: Tanacetum vulgare. It is about one to three feet high, has bipinnatifid, incised-serrate leaves, and flowers in a terminal corymb. It is found in waste places in Britain, but often doubtfully wild. The whole plant is bitter and aromatic. It is sometimes used in domestic economy as an ingredient in puddings, omelets, &c., or for garnishing dishes; and medicinally as an antihelmintic and a febrifuge.
 2. Cook.: A favourite dish of the seventeenth century, and even later, made of eggs, cream, rose water, sugar, and the juice of herbs, as endive, spinach, sorrel, tansy, and baked with butter in a shallow pewter dish.

tantalico-acid, s. [TANTALICO-OXIDE.] tantalico-chloride, s.

Chem.: $TaCl_5$. Obtained as a yellow sublimate when a mixture of tantalico oxide and charcoal is ignited in a stream of chlorine gas. It is decomposed by water yielding hydrochloric acid and hydrated tantalico oxide. Heated to 144°, it volatilizes, and at 221° melts to a yellowish liquid.

tantalico-ochre, s.
Min.: An oxide of tantalum of a brownish colour, said to occur on crystals of tantalita at Pennikojä, Somero, Finland.

tantalico-oxide, s.
Chem.: Ta_2O_5 . Produced by burning tantalum in the air. The anhydrous oxide is a white powder, varying in density from 7.92 to 8.26, and is insoluble in all acids. Hydrated tantalico oxide, or tantalico acid, is obtained by adding water to an aqueous solution of potassium tantalate. It is a snow-white, bulky powder, soluble in hydrochloric and hydrofluoric acids.

tán-tal-ite, s. [Eng. tantal(um); suff. -ite (Min.)]

Min.: An orthorhombic mineral of rare occurrence, found in granitic rocks rich in albite or oligoclase. Hardness, 6 to 6½; sp. gr. 7 to 8; lustre, metallic; colour, black; streak, reddish-brown to black; opaque, brittle. Compos.: a tantalate of the protoxides of iron and manganese, part of the tantalate being sometimes replaced by oxide of tin, forming a stannio-tantalate. Formula (FeO₂NO), TAsO₆.

tán-tá-ll-üm, s. [TANTALUM.]

tán-tal-i-zá-tion, s. [Eng. tantalize(e); -ition.] The act of tantalizing; the state of being tantalized.

"Rosinante's pelms and tantalizations in this night's round."—Gayton: Festivous Notes.

tán-tal-ize, v.t. [Formed from the proper name Tantalus, with suff. -ize (Fr. -iser; Lat. -izo; Gr. -ίζω); Fr. tantaliser.] To tease or torment by presenting something desirable to the view, but continually frustrating the expectations by keeping it out of reach; to excite expectations or fears which will not be realized: to tease, to torment.

"I should otherwise have felt exceedingly tantalized with living under the walls of so great a city full of objects of novelty, without being able to enter it."—Cook: Third Voyage, bk. vi, ch. ix.

tán-tal-iz-ér, s. [Eng. tantalize(e); -er.] One who tantalizes.

"I made, however, no discovery of my determination to this tantalizer."—Wakelield: Memoirs, p. 237.

A. As pr. par.: (See the verb).

B. As adj.: Teasing or tormenting by presenting to the view something unattainable; tormenting.

"In this tantalizing situation the Gloucester continued for near a fortnight, without being able to fetch the road."—Anson: Voyages, bk. ii, ch. ii.

tán-tal-iz-íng-lý, adv. [Eng. tantalizing; -ly.] In a tantalizing manner; so as to tantalize; by tantalizing.

tán-tal-lüm, s. [TANTALUS. Named from the difficulty with which it was obtained.]

Chem.: A pentad metallic element, symb. Ta, at. wt. 182, discovered, in 1803, by Ekeberg, in the minerals tantalite and tytroutantalite. The metal is obtained by heating the fluotantalate of potassium or sodium, with metallic sodium in a covered iron crucible, cooling, and washing out the soluble salts with water. It is a black powder, insoluble in sulphuric, hydrochloric, nitric, or even in nitrohydrochloric acid, but is slowly dissolved in warm aqueous hydrofluoric acid, very rapidly when nitric acid is present. When heated in the air, it burns with a bright light, being converted, though with difficulty, into tantalate oxide.

Tán-tal-lüs, s. [Lat., from Gr. Τάνταλος (Tantalos).]

1. Class. Myth.: A king of Lydia, and son of Jupiter, who, for an offence committed against his father, was condemned to stand in the lower world up to the chin in water, which constantly eluded his lip as often as he attempted to quench the thirst that tormented him. Over his head grew all kinds of fruits; but whenever he reached forth his hands to take them, the wind scattered them to the clouds.

2. Ornith.: A genus of Wading Birds, the type of the old sub-family Tantalinae, variously placed in different classifications. According to Wallace it belongs to the Ciconiidae, with five species from the Ethiopian, Oriental and Neotropical regions, and the southeast of North America. The genus is akin to Ibis, but with a stronger bill. One of the species, *Tantalus (= † Ibis = Plegadis) falcinellus, the Gloomy Ibis, is an occasional British visitor. (Yarrell: Brit. Birds, ed. 4th, iv. 213.)

Tantalus' cup, s. A philosophical toy, consisting of a siphon so adapted to a cup that, the short leg being in the cup, the long leg may go down through the bottom of it. The siphon is concealed within the figure of a man, whose chin is on a level with the bend of the siphon. Hence, as soon as the water rises up to the chin of the image, it begins to subside, so that the figure, like Tantalus in the fable, is unable to quench its thirst.

TANTALUS' CUP.

Tán-tra, s. [Sana., from tan = to believe.]

Hind. Sacred Lit. (Pl.): Compositions, great in number and in some cases extensive, always assuming the form of a dialogue between Siva and his bride in one of her many forms, but chiefly as Uma and Parvati, in which the goddess asks her consort for directions how to perform certain ceremonies, and with what prayers and incantations they should be accompanied. In giving her information, he warns her that it must on no account be divulged to the profane. The Tantrikas, or followers of the Tantras, consider them a fifth Veda, and attribute to them equal antiquity and superior authority. Prof. Horace Hayman Wilson believed that portions of them are older than the Paranas, and that the system originated in the early ages of Christianity. They were composed chiefly in Bengal and Eastern India. The Saktas are great supporters of the Tantras. [SAKTA.]

Tán-trásm, s. [Eng. tantr(a); -ism.] The doctrine of the Tantras.

Tán-trí-ka, s. [Sana., &c.] Hinduism: A follower of the Tantras.

tán-trím, s. [Etym. doubtful.] A burst of ill-humour: a fit of passion; a display of temper. (Generally in the plural.) (Collog.)

"He has been in strange humours and tantrums all the morning."—Lytton: My Novel, bk. xi, ch. ii.

tán-tý, s. [Hind. tánt.] Weaving: The Hindoo loom, consisting of bamboo beams for the warp and cloth, a pair of heddles moved by loops, in which the big toes are inserted, a needle which answers as a shuttle, and a lay.

tán-ý-püs, s. [Gr. τανύπους (tanupous), ταυάνους (taunapous) = long striding, long-legged;

τανύς (tanús) = to stretch, and πούς (pous) = a foot.]

1. Entom.: A genus of Tipulide. Antennæ with fourteen articulations in both sexes, the last but one very long in the males, all the others nearly globular.

2. Palæont.: A species occurs in the Purbeck beds.

tán-ý-síp-tár-a, s. [Gr. τανύσπιτερος (tanúsipteros) = having spreading wings; τανύς (tanús) = to spread, and πτερόν (pteron) = a wing.]

Ornith.: A genus of Alcedinidæ, with fourteen species, from the Maluccas, New Guinea, and North Australia. Bill rather short, somewhat thick, straight, acute; nostrils oval; tail graduated, the two middle feathers the longest.

tán-ýs-tò-ma, s. [Gr. τανύς (tanús) = to stretch out, and στόμα (stoma) = a mouth.]

Entom.: A tribe of Diptera (q.v.), with several families. The antennæ consist apparently of three joints, but often with indications of articulation in the third joint, and with a terminal bristle; the palpi of not more than two joints, and the mouth usually perfect. The larvae have a mors or less distinct head, and produce free pupæ.

tán-ýs-stòme, s. [TANYSSTOMA.] Any dipterous insect of the tribe Tanystoma (q.v.). The gadfly is a familiar British example.

tán-ýz-mát, s. [Arab. pl. of tanzim = a regulation.] The name given to the organic laws, constituting the first contribution towards constitutional government in Turkey, published in 1844 by the Sultan Abdul-Medjid.

Tá-ò-íam, Tá-ón-íam, s. [See def.]

Compar. Relig.: One of the three religions of China. Its founder, Lao-tse, lived, according to tradition in the sixth century B.C. Tao is a word meaning "way." It would seem that Tao represented the course which Lao-tse thought a man should pursue in order to overcome evil. The whole teaching was vague and unsatisfactory; but its followers made a great advance on those that had preceded them, by believing firmly that ultimately good would gain the victory over evil, and by insisting that good should be returned for evil, as the sure way to overcome it. The head of the body was a sort of patriarch, who had the power of transmitting his dignity and office to a member of his own family, and the descendants of the first are said to have held the office for centuries. Tao was afterwards personified, and regarded as the first being of the universe. The Taoists attributed to him eternity and invisibility; but they do not seem to have regarded him as being in any way able to assist or comfort his followers. All they had to do was to contemplate him and his virtues, and to strive to keep in the "way." When Taoism appears as a definite factor in the history of China, in the third century B.C., it appears as a congeries of superstitions; belief in the manifestations of spirits, alchemy, astrology, searching for the herb of immortality, and the sublimation of the body so as to render it ethereal. Taoism was largely modified by Buddhism, some of the doctrines and practices of which it adopted; but it still adheres to its old appetitions, though in its treatises it enjoins much of the Confucian and the Buddhistical morality.

Tá-ò-íst, Tá-ón-íst, a. & s. [Eng. Tao (ism), Taon (ism); -íst.]

A. As adj.: Of or belonging to Taoism (q.v.).

Fabric: A kind of woven hangings of wool or silk, frequently raised and enriched with gold and silver, representing figures of men, animals, historical subjects, &c. The term is of somewhat indefinite meaning, and the purpose equally indeterminate. It was originally intended for hangings, to hide the wall, or make a screen or curtain. Hand tapestry is embroidered by the needle, woollen or silken threads being worked into the meshes of a fabric. The term is also applied to a variety of woven fabrics having a multiplicity of colours in their design, but having no other characteristic of true tapestry.

"The tapestry, the bedding, the walrusots were soon in a blaze."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xxiii.

"The art of making tapestry was known to most of the ancient nations. The hangings and walls of the Jewish tabernacle were a kind of tapestry, some made by the needle and some woven (Exod. xxvi. 1, 31, 36, xxv. 85). There was a kind of tapestry in the houses of the Anglo-Saxon chiefs. That of the ordinary type was introduced, or reintroduced, into Europe by the Saracens, and those Frenchmen who made it were called Sarazinois. The factory at Arras was so celebrated from the fourteenth to the sixteenth century that the name of the town came to be used for the fabric. [ARRAS, Gobelins.] The art reached high perfection in Flanders in the fifteenth century. In the reign of Henry VIII. tapestry-weaving was introduced into England, and a manufactory was commenced at Mortlake in 1619. At first tapestry was used chiefly to decorate churches, but was afterwards employed to beautify the mansions of the aristocracy. The scenes represented have historic interest, from the vivid representation which they present of contemporary life. [BAYEUX-TAPESTRY.] The art is now more common in the East than the West, the use of tapestry having been superseded in Europe by painting, the papering of walls, &c.; but the celebrated manufactory in the Avenue des Gobelins, Paris, which became a State institution in the reign of Louis XIV., still flourishes, and the tapestry produced there is as superior to the Bayeux tapestry as a picture by Rubens is to the crude outline drawings of early Egyptian art.

tapestry-carpet, s. A two-ply carpet in which the warp is first printed and then woven.

táp-és-trý, v.t. [TAPESTRY, s.] To adorn or hang with, or as with tapestry.

"Be my chamber tapestried With the showers of summer."

E. B. Browning: House of Clouds.

táp-ét, *tap-ette, *tap-ite, s. [Lat. tapete.] [TAPESTRY, s.] Worked or figured stuff; tapestry, carpet.

"He commanded such as were about him y^e they should spreade a tapete upon the grounde, & than laye him upon the sayde tapet."—Fabian: Chronicle, ch. cccxxi.

táp-é-ti, s. [Native name.]

Zool.: Lepus brasiliensis, found throughout Brazil, and on various parts of the Andes in Bolivia and Peru.

táp-ét-löss, a. [TAP (3), s.] Not having a tap or head; hence, headless, foolish. (Scotch.)

"The tapettes ran/ceel'd hie/zie Elin's saft at best, and something lazz."

Burns: Epistle to J. Lapraik.

ta-pé-tüm, s. [Mod. Lat., from Lat. tapete = a carpet, tapestry.]

1. Anat.: Certain cross fibres of the corpus callosum spreading outward on the roof of the lateral ventricles of the cerebrum.

2. Compar. Anat.: A shining spot on the outside of the optic nerve in the eyes of certain animals, which is owing to the absence of the pigmentum nigrum occasioning the reflection of a portion of the rays from the membrana ruysschiana. Its use appears to be to cause a double impression on the retina, and thus add to the intensity of vision. It may be observed distinctly in the eye of the common cat.

tápe-worm, s. [Eng. tape, and worm.]

1. Zool.: An intestinal worm, Tania solium, in form somewhat resembling tape. Its length is from five to fifteen yards, and its breadth from two lines at the narrowest part to four or five at the other or broader extremity. At the narrow end is the head, which is terminated anteriorly by a central rostellum, surrounded by a crown of small recurved hooks, and behind them four suckorial depressions; and then follow an immense number of segments, each full of microscopic ova. The segments are capable of being detached when mature, and reproducing the parasite. There is no mouth; but nutrition appears to take place through the tissues of the animal, as algae derive nourishment from the sea-water in which they float. The digestive system consists of two tubes or lateral canals, extending from the anterior to the posterior end of the body, and a transverse canal at the summit of each joint. The tapeworm lives in the small intestines of man, affixing itself by its double circle of hooks. When the reproductive joints or proglottides become mature, they break off and are voided with the stools. They may get into water, or may be blown about with the wind, till some of them are at length swallowed by the pig, and produce a parasite called Cysticercus cellulosus, which causes measles in the pig. When the mealy pork is eaten by man, a tapeworm, the ordinary Tania solium, appears in his intestines. This species mainly affects the poor, who are the chief pork-eaters. Called more fully the Pork Tapeworm. The Beef Tapeworm, Tania medicamentata, has no coronet of hooks on the head. The segments are somewhat larger than in the ordinary tapeworm. It is fifteen to twenty-three feet long. The cysticercus of this species forms measles in the ox, and is swallowed by man in eating beef. It chiefly affects the rich. The Broad Tapeworm, Bothriocephalus latus, is twenty-five feet long by nearly an inch broad, and chiefly affects the inhabitants of Switzerland, Russia, and Poland.

2. Pathol.: Sometimes a person infested by a tapeworm experiences no inconvenience, and never suspects the existence of the parasite till segments of it are passed. Or there may be continual craving for food, debility, pain in the stomach, irritability of the bladder, itching about the nose and anus, vertigo, noises in the ears, faintness, restlessness, and emaciation. [HYDATIDS.]

† tapeworm-shaped, a.

Bot.: Long, cylindrical, and contracted in various places, like the tapeworm.

táp-é-nyé-tér-is, s. [Gr. τάφος (tapfos) = a tomb, and νυκτερίς (nykteris) = a bat.] [TAPHOZOUS.]

táp-é-zó-ús, s. [Gr. τάφος (tapfos) = a tomb, and ζῶω (zōō) = to live. So named by Geoffroy because he discovered the type-species, Taphozous perforatus, in the chambers of the Pyramids. (TOMB-BAT). The other species share its fondness for dark places.]

Zool.: A genus of Bats, belonging to the group Emballonuræ of the family Emballonuridae, from the Ethiopian, Oriental, and Australian regions, with ten species ranging into Egypt and Palestine. Most of these bats have a peculiar glandular sac between the angles of the lower jaw; it is always more developed in males than in females, which, in some species, do not possess any trace of it, though in the males of the same species it may be quite distinct. In Taphozous melanopogon, from India and the East Indies, it is absent from both sexes. In the seven species forming the sub-genus Taphozous, a small band of integument passes from the inferior surface of the fore-arm, and forms, with the wing-membrane, a small pouch; in the other three species (forming the sub-genus Taphonycteris) this pouch is absent.

táp-rén-chý-ma, s. [Gr. τάφος (tapfos) = a ditch, and ἔγχυμα (engchuma) = infusion.]

táp-in-ago (ago as íg), s. [Fr. tapinois = by stealth.] A lurking or skulking. (Gower: C. 4., v.)

táp-í-ō-qa, s. [The Brazilian Indian name.]

Food Products: The powdered root or rhizome of Manihot utilissima (Jatropha Manihot). The root, which is about thirty pounds in weight, and is full of a poisonous juice, is washed, rasped, or rasped and grated, to a pulp. This, being well bruised and thoroughly washed, is heated on iron plates, by which process the poison is drawn off. The powder, when dry, consists of pure starch, and is baked into bread by the natives of Central America. In the United States it is usually made into puddings, and forms a light and nutritious diet. Pearl tapioca is made from prepared grain.

tapioca-starch, s.

Chem.: Purified cassava flour (q.v.). The granules somewhat resemble sago starch in form, but are smaller. They are round at one end, and truncated at the other. The hilum, which is situated at the round end of the granule, is, in some, a slit, in others a distinct cross. Like sago, it is frequently added to the cheaper varieties of arrowroot.

TAPIOCA-STARCH.

tá-pi-ō-lite, s. [After the name of an ancient Finnish mythological subject.]

Min.: A tetragonal mineral occurring in a pegmatitic granite near Suknia, Tammela, Finland. Hardness, 6.0; sp. gr. 7.35; lustre, adamantine to metallic; colour, pure black. Compos. : tantalio acid, 83.1; protoxide of iron, 16.9 = 100, which corresponds with the formula 5FeO, 4Ta₂O₅.

tá-pír, s. [From the French form of the native Brazilian name.]

Zool.: Any individual of the genus Tapirus (q.v.). The South American tapir (Tapirus americanus) is about the size of a small ass, but more stoutly built, legs short, snout prolonged into a proboscis, but destitute of the finger-like process which is present in the elephant's trunk. The skin of the neck forms a thick rounded crest on the nape, with a short stiff mane. It is common throughout South America, ranging from the Isthmus of Darien to the Straits of Magellan. The colour is a uniform deep brown, but the young are marked with yellowish stripes and spots. There is another American species inhabiting the Cordilleras; the back is covered with hair, and the nasal bones are more elongated, on which account Gill has given it generic rank. [TAPIRUS.] The Malayan tapir (T. malayanus) is rather larger than the American species, and has a somewhat longer proboscis; it is maneless. The colour is glossy black, with the back, rump, and sides white, the two colours being distinctly marked off from each other without any gradation. Tapirs inhabit deep recesses of forests, delighting in water, and feeding on young shoots of trees, fruits, and other vegetable substances. They are inoffensive, never attacking man, and are easily tamed. Their flesh is eaten, but is somewhat dry, and their hides are made into leather.

ta-pír-a-vūs, s. [Mod. Lat. tapirus], and Lat. arus = an ancestor.]

Paleont.: A genus of Tapiridae (q.v.), from the Miocene of North America.

ta-pír-i-dæ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. tapirus]; Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -idæ.]

1. Zool.: A family of Perissodactyla (q.v.), with a single genus. [TAPIRUS.]

2. Paleont.: There are several fossil genera, commencing in the Eocene.

fáte, fáť, fáre, šmidst, whát, fáll, fáther; wé, wét, hère, camél, hër, thère; pine, píť, síre, sír, maríne; gó, póč, or, wóre, wólť, wórk, whó, són; müte, öb, öure, üníte, öür, rúle, füll; trý, Šýrian. a, œ = é; ey = ä; qu = kw.

ta-pir'-ô-dôn, s. [Eng. &c. tapir, and Gr. δόντις (odontis), genit. ὀδόντιος (odontios) = a tooth.]

Paleont. : A genus of Mammals having teeth like those of the tapir. One species, from the Red Crag.

ta-pir'-ôid, a. [Eng. tapir; -ôid.] Allied to the tapir or the tapir family.

—In France it is associated with two taproid genera. —Quoines: Early Man in Britain, ch. II.

ta-pir'-ûs, s. [Mod. Lat., from tapir (q.v.)]

1. Zool. : A genus of Tapiridae, from the Neotropical and Oriental sub-regions. Nose prolonged into a short, movable proboscis, skin very thick and covered with close short hair, neck furnished with a kind of stiff mane; tail very short, ears small, erect, and pig-like; four toes on the fore feet, three on the hind feet, separate, and ending in nail-like hoofs; skull pyramidal, as in the hog, with the nasal bones much arched for the muscles of the proboscis. The apparent anomaly of classing animals with four toes with the Perissodactyla is explained by the fact that one of the toes (the fifth digit) is non-functional, and does not touch the ground. Authorities differ greatly as to the number of species from America, one of which has been separated generically by Gill under the name of Elasmognathus. Tapirus malayanus is from the Malay Peninsula and adjacent islands. The genus is allied both to Sus and Rhinoceros.

2. Paleont. : The genus appears first in the Miocene, and is widely distributed in the Post-Pliocene of North America.

ta-pis' (a silent), s. [Fr.] [TAPESTRY, s.] Carpeting, tapestry.

¶ To be (or come) on (or upon) the tapis: To be or come under consideration, in allusion to the tapestry used to cover the table in a council-room. [CARPET, v., 11.]

tâp'-y-tê'-læ, s. [Lat. tap(ete) = a carpet; & connect, and tela = a web.]

Zool. : Walcknaër's name for a sub-division of Araneidae, containing those spinning great webs of a close texture like hammocks, and dwelling in them to catch their prey.

*tâp'-lâsh, s. [Eng. tap (2), s., and lash, prob. = lûsh.]

1. Poor beer; small beer. —Did ever any man run such taplash as this at first broaching? —Parker: Reproof of Rehearsal Transposed, p. 111.

2. The last running of small beer; the dregs or refuse of liquor.

tâp'-lîngs, s. pl. [TAP (3), s.] The whang-leather straps which connect the souple and hand staff.

tâp'-nét, s. [Etyim. doubtful.] A rush basket in which figs are imported.

*tâppe, s. [TAP.]

tâp'-pôt, s. [A dimin. from tap (1), v.]

Machinery:

(1) A projecting arm which is touched by a cam or other moving object, in order to impart an intermittent reciprocation to the rod. Specially used as a valve-motion in steam-engines.

(2) A similar device on the stem of a stamp in an ore-battery. It is struck by a cam, lifting the stamp, which falls as the cam slides from under the tappet, its shoe striking the ore in the mortar.

tappet-motion, s.

Steam-eng. : The apparatus for working the valves of some forms of condensing engines. The valve-rods have levers attached, which are moved by projecting tappets on a rod connected to the beam.

tappet-wheel, s.

Mach. : A wheel having aprons on its periphery, adapted to trip a lever, trip-hammer, falling-mallet, &c., or to raise the stamps of an ore-mill.

*tap-pice, v.t. [TAPISE.]

tâp'-piing, s. [TAP (2), v.]

1. Founding: The jarring of a pattern in its bed in the sand to give it clearance. With small castings this is done by sticking a skewer into the pattern, and tapping it with the slicker or trowel; with larger castings more energetic means are employed, but in the same way.

2. Mech.: The act or process of forming a screw thread in a hole.

3. Mech. & Domestic: Boring a hole in a pipe, cask, &c., to insert a plug, connect a branch-pipe, or introduce a faucet, as the case may be.

4. Surg.: The operation of removing fluid from any of the serous cavities of the body in which it has collected in large quantity; paracentesis. It may be practised on the abdomen, the thorax, the gall-bladder, &c.

tapping-bar, s.

Founding: A round bar with a sharp point, used for letting out the metal from the furnace into the ladles.

tapping-cock, s. A cock having a taper stem, enabling it to be fixed firmly in an opening by driving.

tapping-drill, s. A drill for boring holes in water mains and pipes.

tapping-gouge, s. A gouge used in tapping the sugar-maple, and in making the spiles by which the sap is conducted to the buckets.

tâp'-pit, a. [TAP (3), s.] Crested.

tappit-hen, s.

1. Lit.: A hen with a crest.

2. Fig.: A tin pot with a knob on the top, containing a quart of ale.

—Their hostess... appeared with a huge pewter measuring-pot, containing at least three English quarts, familiarly denominated a tappit-hen, and which, in the language of the hostess, reamed (i.e. mantled) with excellent claret just drawn from the cask. —Scott: Waverley, ch. xi.

tâp-sâl-teër'-ie, adv. [TAP (3), s.] Topsy-turvy. (Scotch.)

tâp'-stêr, *tap-stere, s. [A.S. tappestre, a fem. form of tappe = a tapper; -stera.] One who taps or draws ale in an alehouse. (The word was originally feminine.)

*ta'-pûl, s. [Etyim. doubtful.] Mil.: The sharp projecting ridge down the centre of some breast-plates.

*tâp-wört, s. [Eng. tap (2), s., and wort.] The refuse of the tap; dregs.

—A cup of small tapworte. —Bretton: Joies of Idle Head, p. 26.

ta'-qa, s. [TAQUA.]

ta-qa-rûs'-sa, s. [Brazilian.]

Bot.: The name given to some Brazilian reeds, of the order of Grasses, growing from thirty to forty feet high in the Brazilian forests, with a diameter of six inches. Between the joints they are full of a cool liquid, which quenches the most burning thirst.

tar (1), *tarre, *terre, s. [A.S. teoru, teru; cogn. with Dut. teer; Ice. tjara; Dan. tære; Sw. tjära; Low Ger. tär; Ger. theer; Ir. tearr.]

1. Chem.: A thick, dark-brown, viscid, oily liquid, produced, together with other products, in the dry distillation of organic bodies and of bituminous minerals. [COAL-TAR.] The chemical constitution of tar is very complicated, but it appears to be a mixture of various substances, acid, alkaline, and neutral. True vegetable tar has always an acid reaction, and is readily miscible with alcohol, glacial acetic acid, ether, chloroform, benzol, &c. It is largely used for coating the planks and cordage of ships, for the preservation of fences, for making pitch, &c.

2. Manuf. & Comm.: Tar from the pine-tree, Pinus sylvestris, is brought from Russia, Norway, Germany, and Sweden. It is superior to that manufactured in the United States from other species of pine, though the latter is produced in great quantities in the vast pine forests of North and South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, and other southern states. Tar is produced in these regions by a smothered burning of the long-leaved pine, earth being laid on the heaps of billets to deaden the fire. As it burns the distilled tar runs out through a spout provided for that purpose. From wood tar is further distilled wood vinegar, which in its turn yields wood naphtha. Coal tar, long a troublesome product of gas works, is now being made very useful, crude naphtha being produced from it. The naphtha when purified has many important uses, among them the dissolving of India-rubber. Among the other products of coal tar are the highly important ones of carbolic acid and the aniline colors. [COAL-TAR.]

3. Pharm.: Tar is an external stimulant given in psoriasis, eczema, and other skin diseases. Its vapour inhaled is of use in chronic bronchitis and phthisis.

4. A sailor, a seaman. (In this sense shortened from tarpanin (q.v.).

—His tars passed their time in rioting among the rabble of Portsmouth. —Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xv.

tar-board, s.

Paper: A strong quality of millboard made from junk and old tarred rope.

tar-water, s.

*1. A cold infusion of tar, formerly a celebrated remedy for many chronic affections, especially of the lungs. In 1747 it was strongly recommended by the metaphysician Berkeley, Bishop of Cloyne, in his Siris.

—Or happily when their spirits fanter, Sprinkling o'er Lord of Cloyne's tar-water. —Shenstone: Progress of Taste, iv.

2. The ammoniacal water obtained by condensation in the process of gas manufacture.

tar-well, s.

Gas-works: A tank containing water, through which gas is passed to extract the tar.

tar, v.t. [TAR, s.]

1. To smear or cover with tar.

*2. To smear, to cover, to impregnate.

—I have noluted ye, and tarred ye with my doctrine, And yet the mirren sticks to ye. —Beaumont & Fletcher: Spanish Curate, iii. 2.

¶ (1) Tarred with the same brush: Having the same vices or peculiarities; subject to the same treatment.

(2) To tar and feather a person: To pour heated tar over him, and then cover him with feathers. The practice is very old, and is now practically discontinued.

Zool.: A synonym of Rangifer (q.v.).

Tár-án'-nôn, s. [See def.]

Geog.: A valley and river in North Wales, between Llanidloes and Duras Moroddy.

Tarannon-shale, s.

Geol.: Prof. Ramsay's name for certain beds existing at Tarannon and elsewhere, from South into North Wales. They are 1,000 to 1,500 feet thick in some places, and contain numerous species of Graptolites, corals of the genera Favosites and Cyathophyllyum, a crinoid (Actinocrinus pulcher), and a brachiopod (Lingula ymondiaii). Lyell combined them with the Woolhope Limestone and Shale and the Denbighshire grits, placing the whole under the Wenlock Formation (Upper Silurian). Etheridge makes them of Lower Wenlock age. Called by Sedgwick, Rhayader Slates.

Tarannon-slates, s. pl. [TARANNON-SHALE.]

tár-an-táss, s. [Russ.] A large covered travelling carriage, without springs, but balanced on long poles which serve the purpose, and without seats. Much used in Russia.

ta-rán-têl'-la, s. [Ital.]

Music.: A rapid Neapolitan dance in triplets. So called because it was popularly thought to be a remedy against the supposed poisonous bite of the Tarantula spider, which was said to set people dancing. Older specimens of the dance are not in triplets. [TARANTULA.]

ta-rán'-tism, tár-an-tis'-müs, s. [Fr. tarantisme; Ger. tarantismus, from Ital. tarantula (q.v.).]

Mental Path.: An epidemic dancing mania, prevalent in Italy in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, originating in an exaggerated dread of the consequences resulting from the bite of the tarantula (q.v.), as a remedy for which the dance of the same name was adopted. This mania was most prevalent in Apulia, but spread over the great part of the peninsula. Tarantism was closely allied to St. Vitus's Dance, and other epidemic nervous disorders of the latter period of the middle ages, but differed from them in its origin, in the wasting away of the sufferer, in their rhythmic movements, their partiality for bright and luminous surfaces, their passion for music, and its employment as a means of cure. According to other authorities, the disease consisted in the sufferer being attacked with extreme somnolency, which could only be overcome by music and dancing. It has long been satisfactorily established that the bite of the tarantula is incapable of producing serious consequences; so that while it is possible that some minor physical symptoms may have resulted from the direct effect of the bite, the mental disturbances and muscular agitations were certainly due to the secondary effects of these physical results upon the imagination.

"Of longer duration than the dancing epidemics of Northern Europe, tarantism was at its height in the seventeenth century, and gradually died out in the eighteenth, leaving only a designation for a lively dance as its harmless legacy."—Quain's Dict. Med., p. 1,488.

ta-rán'-tu-la, s. [Ital. tarantella; O. Ital. tarantola; Fr. tarantule, from Lat. Tarantulum (now Taranto), a town in the south of Italy, where the animal is found.]

1. Zool.: Lycosa tarantula, a large spider, with a body about an inch in length; its bite was formerly supposed to produce tarantism

(q.v.), and doubtless, in some cases, produces disagreeable symptoms. It is a native of Italy, but varieties, or closely allied species, are found throughout the south of Europe. An American tarantula (Eurypelma hentzi), found in sub-tropical regions, closely resembles the European variety. Its bite is much dreaded.

* 2. The same as TARANTISM (q.v.).

3. A dance; also the music to which it is performed. [TARANTELLA.]

* ta-rán'-tu-lát-éd, a. [TARANTULA.] Bitten by a tarantula; suffering from tarantism.

"Motions unwill'd its pow'rs have shown, tár-a-pa-ca'-ite, s. [After Tarapaca, Peru, where found; suff. -ite (Min.).]

Min.: A mineral described by Raimondi as occurring in minute fragments, mixed with nitrate (q.v.). Colour, a brilliant yellow. Compos.: essentially a chromate of potassium; Dana suggests that it needs further examination.

ta-ráx-a'-çin, s. [Lat. taraxacum]; -in.]

Chem.: The bitter principle of dandelion-root, extracted from the milky juice by boiling with water and allowing the concentrated decoction to evaporate. It forms warty crystals of a sharp, bitter taste, soluble in ether, alcohol, and boiling water.

ta-ráx-a'-cüm, s. [Gr. τάραξις (taraxis) = confusion, from ράσσω (tarassô) = to stir up. Named from its alterative effects.]

1. Bot.: Dandelion; a genus of Lactuceæ. Perennial scapigerous milky Composites, with entire or pinnatifid leaves, all radical. Inflorescence a scape, the stalk of which is fistular and leafless; bracts imbricate; receptacle flat, naked, pitted; florets all ligulate, pappus in many series simple, white; fruit compressed, ribbed, mucricate above, beaked. Number of species doubtful; perhaps only one, with many varieties. Found in all temperate climates. Taraxacum officinale is the Dandelion; called also Leontodon Taraxacum and Taraxacum Dens Leonis. Sir Joseph Hooker makes these varieties Dens leonis, erythrospermum, levigatum, and palustre.

2. Pharm.: Decoction, extract, and juice of Taraxacum, i.e., of the Dandelion root, have been given in liver complaint, but are of doubtful efficacy.

Bot.: A sub-order of Marchantiaceae, having the spore-cases sub-marginal and solitary, and the involucre wanting.

tār-gī-ō-nī-ā, s. [Named after John Anthony Targiooli, a Florentine botanist.]

Bot.: The typical genus of Targionee (q.v.). Frond somewhat fleshy, smooth, deep green, purplish at the edges, forming large patches on moist and exposed banks; capsule solitary, globose, nearly sessile, arising from the end of the midrib of the lower face of the frond. It bursts irregularly at the top, discharging spores and elaters. The species exist chiefly in warm countries.

tār-gī-ō-nī-te, s. [Etym. doubtful.]

Min.: A name given by Bechi in a communication to Dana, but it is printed in his note (American Jour. Science, ser. II., vol. xiv., 1852, p. 60) as Jargionite. Apparently the same as Steinmannite (q.v.).

Tār-gūm, s. [Chaldee (E. Aramaean) תַּרְגוּם (targum), תַּרְגוּמָא (targuma) = interpretation, translation; תַּרְגָּם (targem) = to interpret, to translate.]

Jewish Literature: A Chaldee version or paraphrase of the Old Testament, necessitated by the fact that the exiles who returned from Babylon knew that language well, and had partly lost acquaintance with their own. When the Scriptures were read in the synagogues after the return from Babylon, an interpretation or occasional comment was added in Chaldee, then the oral explanations were written, and finally regular Targums arose. There are ten known Targums. The oldest is believed to have been that of Onkelos, which is confined to the Pentateuch. Dr. Samuel Davidson believed that Onkelos was the same as Aquila, that he was a mythic person, and did not write the Targum which bears his name. It was at first a Palestinian production, but was afterwards modified by Babylonian Jews. It remained for many years in an unfixed state, but was finally completed by the end of the third century. It was first printed A.D. 1482, and there were many subsequent editions. The next important Targum was that of Jonathan Ben Uzziel, on Joshua, Judges, Samuel, Kings, and the Prophets. It seems to have arisen in the same way as its predecessor, and to have been completed about the end of the fourth century. A third Targum, called that of the Pseudo-Jonathan, and confined to the Pentateuch, alludes to Khadiyah and Fatima, two of Muhammed's wives, and is not earlier than the middle of the seventh century. A fourth is the Jerusalem one, or the Pentateuch. It is fragmentary, and resembles that of the Pseudo-Jonathan, which it may have preceded by a century. There are less important Targums on the Hagiographa.

"This seed, there spoken of, is Christ, as both the targums expound it."—Archbp. Patrick: On Genesis, III. 14.

tār-gūm-ist, s. [Eng. targum; -ist.] The writer of a targum; one versed in the literature and language of the targums.

"Jonathan or Onkelos, the targumists, were of clearer language."—Milton: Apology for Smectymnus.

*tār-hood, s. [Eng. tar; -hood.] The state or condition of being a tar; sailors collectively.

"Huddled by the whole tarhood."—Walpole: T. Mann, II. 285.

tā-rī, s. [Native name.] The sap of Phenix sylvestris. In India it is used as a beverage, sometimes in its natural condition and sometimes fermented.

*tār-i-ān, s. [Wel.] An ancient British shield.

tār-iff, s. [O. Fr. tariffe = arithmetic, casting of accounts (Fr. tarif), from Sp. tarifa = a list of prices, a book of rates, from Arab. ta'rif = giving information, from drf = knowing, knowledge.]

1. A list or table of goods with the duties or customs to which they are liable, either on exportation or importation; a list or table of duties or customs to be paid on goods imported or exported, whether such duties are imposed by the government of a country or are agreed upon between the governments of two countries having commerce with each other.

"However absurd a tariff may be, a smuggler is hat to obey to be a knave and a ruffian."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xxi.

2. A table or scale of charges generally.

3. A law of Congress fixing the amount of import duties.

¶ In the United States the question of free trade or protection has given great interest to tariff legislation, and the increasing or decreasing of customs duties, and the tariff controversy has been one of the leading elements of party division. It formerly divided attention with slavery, currency, and state-rights questions, but now stands almost alone, as the main cause of division between the two great political parties of the nation. In England the early tariffs were prohibitions, forbidding the importation of articles which parliament decided could be made at home. The use of the tariff as a source of revenues did not begin till the reign of Queen Elizabeth. Prohibition did not cease, however, in regard to certain articles, and as late as 1819 the prohibitory policy was in part continued, in the masked method of placing duties so high as to exclude the article discriminated against. Since then the policy of free trade has been adopted in the British Islands, and the number of articles paying duties decreased until only a few remain. In the United States, after independence had been declared, each state adopted a tariff of its own, the result of this condition of affairs being so disturbing to the public interests that the power was transferred to the national government by the Constitution, and in 1789 a tariff law applicable to the whole country was reported by James Madison and passed. The protective policy was generally sustained during the early period of national existence, and the tariff increased after the second war with Great Britain, to protect the manufacturing industries which had been started during that struggle. The opposition to a high tariff, which at first came from New England, was afterwards diverted to the South, and in 1832 a lower tariff policy was adopted, which continued in force till 1842. Various fluctuations took place between that date and 1861, when the protective tariff of the war period was established. From that period until 1894 the protective tariff policy prevailed, the McKinley Tariff of 1890 being the highest in many of its rates of duty the country had known. In 1894 the Democratic party gaining the majority in Congress, a new tariff bill was passed, considerably reducing the rates of duty, and placing numerous articles of the nature of raw materials on the free list, the measure adopted being in part protective, in part for revenue only, while an income tax feature was added to it to meet the expected decrease in revenue. On May 20, 1895, however, the United States Supreme Court decided, by a vote of five to four, that the income tax clause was unconstitutional, and therefore void.

tar-nish, v.t. & i. [Fr. terniss, stem of ternissant, pr. par. of se ternir = to wax pale, to lose its lustre; from M. H. Ger. ternen; O. H. Ger. ternan, ternjan = to obscure, to darken; cogn. with A. S. dernan, dýrnan = to hide; O. Sax. derni; O. Fries. der = hidden, secret.]

A. Transitive:

1. To soil, by an alteration induced by the air, dust, or the like; to diminish or destroy the lustre of; to sully.

"Some patterns yet like tarnish'd lace are worn,
And now disguise what once they did adorn."
Pulten: Memoirs; To the Reader & Writer of Lives.

2. To give, as to gold or silver, a pale or dim cast, without either polishing or burnishing it.

"If a fine object should tarnish by having a great many see it, or the music should run mostly into one man's ears, these satisfactions would be made inclosure."
Collier: Of Envy.

3. To diminish or destroy the purity or lustre of; to cast a stain upon; to sully, to stain.

"Let him pray for resolution, that he may discover nothing that may discredit the cause, tarnish the glory, and weaken the example of the suffering."
Collier.

B. Intrans: to lose lustre, to become dull.

"Till thy fresh glories, which eow thine so bright, Grow stale and tarnish with our daily sight."
Dryden: Abelom & Achitophel, l. 243.

tar-nish, v. [TARNISH, v.] A stain, a blot, a tarnished state.

tar-nish-er, s. [Eng. tarnish; -er.] One who or that which tarnishes.

ta-rô (1), ta-ra (2), s. [Native name.] The tubercular roots of Colocasia esculenta (Caladium esculentum) and Colocasia macrorrhiza. [COLOCASIA.] The Taru plant belongs to the natural order Araceae, and is of the same genus with the Cocco or Edoes. It is cultivated for its roots, which are a principal article of food in the South Sea Islands. These are washed to get rid of their acridity, and are cooked in the same way as bread-fruit; they may also be prepared for food by boiling, or be made into a pudding. Taru also yields a pleasant flour. The plant has no stalk, its leaves, which are broad and heart-shaped, springing directly from the root. These leaves are used as spinach.

ta-rô (2), s. [See def.] A Maltese money of account, value about 1/3 of a penny sterling.

tar'-ôc, s. [Etym. doubtful.] A game st cards, played with seventy-eight cards.

tar'-pân, tar'-pa-nÿ, s. [Various Tartar dialects.]

Zool.: The wild horse of Tartary. It is mouse-coloured, with a stripe along the back, and is supposed to present the nearest approach to the stock from which the domestic horse was derived. The tarpans roam in thousands in the great treeless plains of Tartary, where natives catch them by the lassos.

tar-pâu-lin, tar-pâu-ling, tar-pâw-ling, s. [Eng. tar, and padding = a covering, from pull (Lat. pallia).]

1. A cloth of stout canvas, coated with tar or other waterproof compound. Employed on shipboard and ashore for covering hatches, boats, hammocks, &c., and protecting articles generally from the weather. A tarpaulin, or thick unpainted canvas, sometimes called a paulin, forms part of the equipment for each carriage of a field-battery of artillery.

†2. A sailor. (Now usually abbreviated to tar.)

3. A sailor's hat, covered with painted or tarred cloth; a painted or tarred canvas cover generally.

Tar-pé'-i-an, a. Of or named after Tarpela, a woman who opened the gates of the citadel of Rome to its enemies, the Sabines, under promise of receiving that which they wore on their left arms. Instead of the golden bracelets she expected, the Sabines threw their shields upon her as they entered, and crushed her.

Tarpeian-Rock, s. A cliff on the southern side of the Capitoline Hill at Rome, from which criminals sentenced to death were frequently hurled.

tar'-pôn, tar'-pûm, s. [Native Indian name.] A large American fish of the family Clupeidae. This fish, Megalops atlanticus, is common in the warm waters of the southern Atlantic and the Gulf of Mexico, and ascends the coast as far as Cape Cod. It is the giant of the herring family, attaining at times a length of six feet and a weight of 150 pounds. It is edible, but not prized as food, but is becoming a favorite game fish in the southern waters. Fished for with rod and line it tries all the skill of the angler.

tär'-ri-ër (1), *tar-i-er, s. [Eng. tarry; -er.] One who tarries, delays, or stays.

"And for that cause he is often times called of them Fabius duocitor, that is to say, the tarrier or delayer."
-Elyot: Governour, bk. 1, ch. xliii.

tär'-ri-ër (2), s. [TERRIER (1), a] tar'-ring and feath'-er-ing, s. A form of popular punishment occasionally adopted by mobs in the United States, in cases where it is intended rather to disgrace than to injure the victim. The person who is to be subjected to the outrage is stripped of his clothing and melted tar poured over his body, and is then covered with a coating of feathers, which adhere to the soft tar. If it is proposed to make the punishment still more disgraceful he may be ridden on a rail or conveyed in a cart through the streets as a spectacle for all eyes. The latest instance of this outrage was in Colorado during the disturbances attending the railroad strike of 1894.

tär'-röck, s. [Greenland atarrök.] The name given in Orkney to the Kittiwake. (See extract.)

"The tarröck (Larus tridactylus, Lin. Syst.) which seems to be our kittiwake, is by far the most common of the kind in this place."

tar'-si, s. pl. [TARSUS.]

tar'-si-a, tar-si-a-tü'-ra, s. [Ital.] A species of inlaying in wood, much practised in Italy during the Middle Ages, especially for wall-panelling. Wood in its natural colours was employed in the earlier specimens, but afterwards, when more complicated figures, birds, flowers, &c., were introduced, the various pieces were stained. Shades are produced by immersing the pieces in hot sand; the design is built up on paper, and applied in the manner of veneer.

tar'-si-ër, s. [TARSUS.]

fäte, fät, färe, amidst, whät, fäll, father; wö, wët, hère, camél, hër, thère; pine, pít, síre, sír, marine; gö, pöt, er, wöre, wölf, wörk, whö, söñ; müte, öub, öüre, quite, cür, räle, füll; trÿ, Sÿrian. æ, œ = ö; øy = ä; qu = kw.

tar-si-i-dae, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. tarsi(us); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -idae.]

Zool.: A family of Lemnuroidea (q.v.), with a single genus, Tarsius (q.v.).

tar-si-pé-di-nae, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. tarsipes, genit. tarsiped(is); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -inae.]

Zool.: A sub-family of Phalangistidae (q.v.), with a single genus, Tarsipes (q.v.). Teeth almost rudimentary and variable in number; tongue long, slender, pointed, and very extensible.

tar-si-pés, s. [Mod. Lat. tarsus], and Lat. pes = a foot. Named from a supposed resemblance of its foot to that of Tarsius (q.v.), though it has not the peculiar extension of the calcaneum and scaphoid characteristic of the latter genus.]

Zool.: The sole genus of the sub-family Tarsipedinae (q.v.), with a single species, Tarsipes rostratus, the Noolbenger or Tait, from Western Australia. Head with elongated and slender muzzle, mouth-opening small; fore feet with five well-developed toes, hind feet rather long and slender; ears moderate, rounded; tail prehensile, longer than head and body. This little marsupial lives in trees and bushes, and uses its tail in climbing; it feeds on honey, which it procures by inserting its long tongue into the blossoms of flowers; but one which Mr. Gould kept in confinement ate flies readily.

TARSIPESTRATUS.

tar-si-lis, s. [Mod. Lat., from Lat. tarsus (q.v.). Named from the immensely elongated tarsal portion of the foot.]

Zool.: The sole genus of the family Tarsiidae (q.v.), with a single species, Tarsius spectrum, the Tarsier, Malmag, or Spectre Tarsier, a very singular little animal, somewhat smaller than an English squirrel, with very large eyes and ears, and a long thin tail, with a tuft at the end; general colour fawn-brown, bare parts of a flesh tint, forehead, face, and nose reddish, with a black streak over the eye. It is found in the forests of many of the islands of the Indo-Malayan Archipelago, feeding on insects and lizards. It sleeps during the day, but is very active by night, moving from place to place by jumps, a method of progression, for which its curious hind legs, not unlike those of a frog, are well adapted. Its strange appearance causes it to be regarded with superstitious awe by the natives of the East Indian Archipelago. The Tarsier is rare, not more than two being generally found together, and only produces one at a birth.

TARSIVS SPECTRUM.

tar-só, pref. [TARSUS.] Of or belonging to the tarsus (q.v.).

tarsometatarsal, c. & s.

A. As adj.: Belonging to or connected with the tarsus and the metatarsus; as, the tarsometatarsal ligaments.

B. As substantive:

Compar. Anat.: That part of a bird's leg which is commonly called the tarsus in descriptive ornithology; the bone reaching from the tibia to the toes, which has at its top one of the small tarsal bones confluent with it, so that it consists of part of the tarsus as well as the whole of the metatarsus.

Tarsometatarsal articulations:

Anat.: The articulations of the four anterior bones of the tarsus; viz., the three cuneiform and the cuboid bones with the metatarsal bones.

tar-sór-rha-phý, s. [Lat. tarsus = a cartilage of the eyelids, and Gr. ῥαφή (rhaphe) = a seam, a suture; ῥάπτω (rhapto) = to sew.]

Surg.: An operation for diminishing the size of an opening between the eyelids when it is enlarged by surrounding cicatrices.

tar-sót-ó-mý, s. [Lat. tarsus = a cartilage of the eyelids, and Gr. τομή (tome) = a cutting.]

Surg.: The section or removal of the tarsal cartilages.

tar-sús (pl. tar-sí), s. [Gr. ῥαρός (tarsos) = a stand or frame of wicker-work, a flat basket, the flat of the foot, &c.]

1. Anatomy:

(1) The seven small bones constituting the ankle or instep in man; viz., the calcaneum, the astragalus, the cuboid, the scaphoid, and the three metatarsal bones. They correspond with the carpus or wrist of the anterior limb.

(2) (Pl.): The tarsal cartilages (q.v.).

2. Entom. & Zool. (Pl.): (1) The last segments of the legs of insects. (2) The jointed feet of other articulated or annulose animals.

3. Ornith.: The Shank of a bird. It may be naked or feathered. In the former case it is protected by scales.

tart, tarte*, a. [A.S. teart = tart, sharp, severe, lit. = tearing, from ter, pa. t. of teran = to tear (q.v).]

1. Sharp to the taste; acid, acidulated.

"The juices is very tart."—Dampier: Voyages (1st ed.).

2. Sharp, severe, biting, keen.

"The popular harangue, the tart reply, The logic, and the wisdom, and the wit, And the loud laugh."—Cooper: Task, IV. 51.

tart, tarte*, s. [Fr. tarte, tourte, from Lat. torta, fem. sing. of torvus = twisted, pa. par. of torquere = to twist; Ital. tartera, torta; Sp. torta; Dut. taart; Ger. torte; Dan. torte.] A kind of small open pie or piece of pastry, consisting of fruit or preserve baked and inclosed in, or surrounded by, paste.

"It grows on a bushy plant, has a bitterish taste, rather insipid; but may be eaten either raw or in tarta, and is used as food by the natives."—Cook: Second Voyage, bk. IV., ch. II.

tart-rhubarb, s. Rheum Rhaponticum and R. hybridum. [RHUBARB.]

tar-tan (1), s. & a. [Fr. tiretaine = linsey-woolsey, from Sp. tritaná = a thin woollen cloth, a sort of thin silk, from its flimsiness; Port. tritar = to shiver, to shake with cold; Port. tritarana.]

A. As substantive:

Fabric: Woollen cloth, cross-barred with stripes of various colours, forming panels, and constituting the peculiar pattern which are said to have formerly distinguished the different Scottish Highland clans, each clan having its own peculiar pattern. North (Report of Dress, Arms, & Sciences of the Highlanders, II, 16-19) gives a list of the tartans, but other authorities think that the patterns are of comparatively recent invention. The term is also applied to the checkered patterns themselves in which the cloth is woven, and which are frequently printed or painted on various surfaces, as paper, wood, &c.

¶ The weaving of particolored and striped cloth cannot be claimed as peculiar to any country or people, such checks being, indeed, the simplest ornamental forms to which dyed yarns can be combined in the looms. But the use of the variegated cloth termed tartan by the Highlanders of Scotland is probably of great antiquity, each clan having for centuries had its special distinguishing tartan. After the Revolution of 1745 Acts of Parliament were passed in which the use of the Highland dress in Scotland was prohibited under severe penalties. These acts remained nominally in force until 1782, when they were repealed, and since that time clan tartan, with varying fluctuations of fashion, has been a popular article of dress, its use being by no means confined to Scotland, while manufacturers have invented so many new "sets" or alterations of color, that the heraldry of tartans has become much confused. The manufacture of this class of goods has long been carried on at the historic locality of Bannockburn, near Stirling, and is still a feature of the local industries at that place.

B. As adj.: Consisting of, made from, or resembling tartan; having the pattern of a tartan.

tar-tan (2), tar-tane, s. [Fr. tartans; Sp., Port., & Ital. tartana, from Arab. taridāh = a kind of vessel specially adapted for transporting horses.]

Naut.: A small vessel with one mast and a bowsprit, the mainsail being spread by a lateen yard. Used in the Mediterranean.

TARTAN.

Tar-tar (1), s. & a. [Better spelled Tatar. The r was inserted in medieval times to suggest that the Asiatic hordes who occasioned such anxiety to Europe came from hell (Tartarus), and were the locusts of Revelation IX. Pers. Tádir = a Tartar or Scythian.]

A. As substantive:

1. A native of Tartary, a name loosely applied to members of various Mongolian races in Asia and Europe. It was originally applied to certain Tungusic tribes in Chinese Tartary, but was extended to the Mongols, Turks, and other tribes which formed the devastating army of Genghis Khan and his successors. It is now loosely applied to tribes of mixed origin in the steppes of Siberia, Russia, and Tartary, including the Kazan Tartars, Crim Tartars, Kipchaks, Kalmucks, &c. In classifying languages, Tartaric is applied to the Turkish group.

"Swifter than arrow from the Tartar's bow."—Shakespeare: Midsummer Night's Dream, III. 2.

2. A courier employed by the Ottoman Porte, and by the European ambassadors in Constantinople.

3. A person of a keen, irritable temper; a vixen, a shrew.

B. As adj.: Pertaining to Tartary or the Tartars.

¶ To catch a Tartar: To be caught in one's own trap; to catch more than was bargained for.

Tartar-bread, s.

Bot.: (1) The great fleshy root of Crambe tartarica. (2) Crambe tartarica. [CRAMBE (1).]

Tartar (2), s. [Lat. Tartarus.] Hell.

"He might return to nasty Tartar back."—Shakespeare: Henry V., II. 2.

tar-tar (3), s. [Fr. tartre, from Low Lat. tartarum = the deposit in wine-casks; Sp. & Ital. tartaro.]

Chem.: A generic name for tartaric acid, but applied especially to the acid tartrate of potassium. [ARGOL, CREAM OF TARTAR.]

† (1) Petrified tartar: [TARTARUM.]

(2) Tartar of the Teeth: An earthy substance which is deposited from the saliva on the teeth when proper attention is not paid to them. It consists of salivary mucus, animal matter, and phosphate of lime.

tartar-etic, s.

Chem. & Pharm.: Tartarated antimony. $KO \cdot SbO_3 \cdot C_2H_4O_6 + 2H_2O$, or $KSbC_2H_4O_7 \cdot H_2O$. Internally in small doses it is diaphoretic, expectorant, and probably cholagogue; in larger doses it is an emetic or a purgative. When a patient becomes accustomed to it, it is then sedative. Externally it is a powerful irritant, producing pustules like those of small-pox. As an ointment or a hot aqueous solution, it is a powerful counter-irritant.

tar-tar-át-éd, a. [Eng. tartar; -ated.] Having tartaric-acid in its composition.

¶ Tartarated-antimony is tartar-etic (q.v.); tartarated-iron is used in pharmacy as a blood restorer; and tartarated-soda is Rochelle-salt or Sodio-potassic tartrate (q.v.).

ból, bóy; pout, fowl; cat, cell, chorus, chin, bench; go, gem; thin, this; sin, as; expect, Xenophon, exist. -ing. -cian, -tian = shán. -tion, -sion = shün; -fion, -gion = zhün. -cious, -tious, -sious = shús. -ble, -dle, &c. = bpl, dpl.

* tar-tär'-ë-an, * tar-tär'-ë-ous (1), a. [Lat. Tartareus, from Tartarus = hell.] Pertaining to or characteristic of hell; hellish, infernal.

"At this day,
When a Tartarean darkness overpreads
The groaning nations."
Wordsworth: Excursion, bk. iv.

* tar-tär'-ë-ous (2), a. [Eng. tartar (3); -eous.]

1. Ord. Lang.: Consisting of tartar; resembling or partaking of the nature of tartar.

"In fruits, the tartareous parts of the sap are thrown upon the fibres designed for the stone, and the oily upon the seed within it."—Brew: Cosmologia.

2. Bot.: Having a rough crumpling surface, like the thallus of some lichens.

tartareous-moss, s.

Bot. & Dyeing: A lichen, Lecanora tartarea. [CUBBEAR.]

* Tar-tär'-i-an, Tar-tär'-ic (1), a. [Eng. Tartary; -ian, -ic.] Of or pertaining to Tartary; Tartar.

Tartarian-bread, s. [TARTAR-BREAD.]

Tartarian-lamb, s.

Bot.: Cibotium Barometz. [BAROMETZ.]

* tar-tär'-ic (2), a. [Eng. tartar (3); -ic.] Of, pertaining to, or obtained from tartar.

tartaric-acid, s.

1. Chem.: $C_4H_6O_6 = CHHO-CO_2H$. This formula includes four bibasic acids distinguished especially by their crystalline forms and action on polarised light. (1) Dextro-tartaric acid; ordinary tartaric acid. Found in grapes, tamarinds, pine-apples, and other fruits, and prepared commercially from the argol, or impure potassium tartrate deposited from wine by converting it into a calcium salt, decomposing with dilute sulphuric acid, and allowing the solution to crystallize in a warm place. It forms colourless, monoclinic prisms, which are readily soluble in water and alcohol, has a pure acid taste, and turns the plane of polarisation to the right. The acid is largely used by calico-printers.

(2) Levo-tartaric acid (q.v.). (3) Racemic-acid (q.v.). (4) Meso-tartaric acid. Inactive tartaric acid. Obtained by the oxidation of sorbin. It has no action on polarised light.

2. Pharm.: Tartaric-acid diminishes thirst in fevers. It is generally given in the form of cream of tartar or with bicarbonate of soda as an effervescent draught.

Tartaric acid exists, either free or in combination with basic substances, in the juices of many fruits and plants. The subacid flavor of the grape, pine-apple, and rowan is due to its presence. The crystals obtained from argol have a pleasant acid taste, and the solution reddens litmus. When rubbed in the dark they become luminous. When tartaric acid is heated it melts, forming the isomeric metatartaric acid. If the heating be continued it decomposes into a number of chemical substances, including among them formic acid, carbonic acid, and acetone. Being a dibasic acid, Tartaric acid forms a large number of salts, many of them important. Bitartrate of potash, or cream of tartar, $KHC_4H_4O_6$ is obtained by purifying the crude argol by crystallization. It is used, with baking soda, as a baking powder, while medicinally it is a useful purgative, and is a household remedy for clearing the blood in spring. Tartarated iron, or tartrate of iron and potash, acts as a mild tonic, which, when dissolved in sherry, constitutes iron wine. Tartar emetic (q.v.) is another useful compound which, while important for its medicinal properties, is dangerous in unskillful hands, and has gained notoriety from being employed in several famous poisoning cases. A dose of $\frac{3}{4}$ grain has proved fatal to a child and one of 2 grains to an adult. Usually a dose of 1-10 to 1-7 of a grain is given, but if used as an emetic the dose may be from 1 to 3 grains.

tartaric-anhydrides, s. pl.

Chem.: Tartaric acid is capable of forming several anhydrides, three of which are known.

(1) Ditartaric acid = $C_4H_6O_6$ (tertraic acid).

Formed by heating tartaric acid for some time at a temperature of 170°. Is very soluble in water and not crystallizable. Its salts are resolved by boiling into ordinary tartarates.

(2) Tartretic acid = $C_4H_4O_5$. Soluble tartaric anhydride. Obtained by quickly heating small quantities of tartaric acid until it swells up. It is a yellowish, deliquescent mass, which dissolves in water, forming an acid solution. (3) Insoluble tartaric anhydride. $C_4H_4O_5$. Obtained by heating tartaric acid for some time to 150°, exhausting the product with cold water, and drying it in a vacuum. It is a white powder, insoluble in water, alcohol, and ether, and converted by boiling into tartaric acid.

* tar'-tar'-in, * tar'-tar'-ine, s. [Eng. tartar (3); -in, -ine.] An old name for potash.

* tar-tär'-i-üm, s. [TARTARIN.]

* tar-tär'-i-zä'-tion, s. [Eng. tartaric(e); -ation.] The act of tartarizing or of forming tartar.

* tar-tär'-ize, v.t. [Eng. tartar (3); -ize.] To impregnate with tartar; to refine by means of the salt of tartar.

* Tar-tär'-üs (1), a. [Eng. Tartar (1); -ous.] Of, pertaining to, or characteristic of a Tartar; Tartaric, wild, savage.

"All the tartarous moods of common men."

Ben Jonson: Poetaster, v. 1.

* tar-tär'-üs (2), a. [Eng. tartar (3); -ous.] Containing or consisting of tartar; resembling tartar.

"The sapidity of tartarous salts, and the fiery acrimony of alkaline salts, produce nascent passions and anxieties in the soul."—Berkeley: Siris, § 86.

* tar-tär'-üm, s. [Latinised form of Eng. tartar (3) (q.v.).] A preparation of tartar. Called also Petrified tartar.

* Tar-tär'-üs, s. [Lat., from Gr. Tάρταρος (Tártaros).]

Classic Mythol.: A fabled deep and aimless abyss in the lower world, situated, according to Hesiod and Homer, as far below the earth as the earth is below heaven. According to the later poets, Tartarus was the place in which the spirits of the wicked received their due punishment, and sometimes the word is used as synonymous with Hades, or the lower world in general.

* Tar-tär'-ý, s. [Lat. Tartarus.] Tartarus, hell. (Spenser.)

* tar-tär'-ine, s. [See def.]

Fabric: A kind of silk stuff. So called because said to have been obtained from the Tartars.

* tart'-ish, a. [Eng. tart, s.; -ish.] Somewhat tart or acid; rather tart.

* tart'-lët, s. [Fr. tartelette, dimin. from O. Fr. tarte = a tart (q.v.).] A little tart.

* tart'-ly, adv. [Eng. tart, a.; -ly.]

1. In a tart manner; with tartness or acidity of taste.

2. Sharply, severely, bitterly.

"Tartly ridiculing the pretences commonly made for it."—Waterland: Works, viii. 158.

3. With sourness of aspect; sharply.

"How tartly that gentleman looks!"—Shakep.: Much Ado About Nothing, II.

* tart'-ness, s. [Eng. tart, a.; -ness.]

1. Sharpness to the taste; sourness, acidity.

"The juices had an agreeable tartness, though but little flavour."—Cook: First Voyage, bk. III. ch. 1.

2. Sharpness of language or manner; bitterness, acerbity.

"The tartness of his face sours ripe grapes."—Shakep.: Coriolanus, v. 4.

* tar-tra, tar-tr-, pref. [TARTRATE, TARTAR (3)]. Having tartaric acid in its composition.

* tar-tra-mö'-thäne, s. [Pref. tartra-, and Eng. methane. [TARTRAMIC-ETHER.]

* tar-träm'-ic, a. [Pref. tartr-, and Eng. amic.] Derived from or containing tartaric acid and ammonia.

tartramic-acid, s.

Chem.: $(CHHO)_2 COOH$. Obtained as an ammonium salt by the action of ammonia on tartaric anhydride. The free acid separated from its calcium salt by sulphuric acid is asyrrup.

tartramio-ether, s.

Chem.: $(CHHO)_2 CO(NH_2)_2 CO(C_2H_5)_2 O$. Tartramethane. Obtained by the action of alcoholic ammonia on tartaric ether. Ammonia converts it into tartramide.

* tar'-trä-mide, s. [Pref. tartr-, and Eng. amide (q.v.).]

Chem.: $C_2H_5(OH)(CO-NH_2)_2$. Obtained by gently heating diethyl tartrate with alcoholic ammonia. It forms rhombic crystals, soluble in water and alcohol.

* tar'-trä-nil, s. [Pref. tartr-, and Eng. anti-line.]

Chem.: $C_2H_5O(CO(NH_2))_2 CO(C_6H_5)_2 O$. Phenyltartramide. Obtained by the dehydration of tartrate of aniline. It may be purified by recrystallization. It is tasteless, forms nacereous laminae which dissolve in water and alcohol, but sparingly in ether, melt about 200°, and decompose at 230°.

* tar'-trate, tar'-tar-ate, s. [Eng. tar (tr)(ic); suff. -ate (Chem.).]

1. Chem.: A salt of tartaric acid.

2. Pharm.: Tartrate of iron an. potash = Tartarated iron (q.v.). Tartrate of potash is given as a diuretic and alterative, or in larger doses as a purgative, and tartrate of soda and potash is Rochelle Salt (q.v.).

"In the process of ripening of wines a considerable quantity of tartrate of potash is deposited by port wine and some other wines; and this, mixed with the coloring matter, forms the crust so well known in old port wine, and which lines that side of the bottle which has been laid down. Many attempts have been made to cause a rapid deposition of this substance by chemical means, but without success. Tartrate of lead, produced by adding cream of tartar to acetate of lead in solution, if dried and introduced into a tube, which is then exposed to red heat and sealed, deposits a finely divided form of lead. If the tube be then broken and its contents shaken out, they will catch fire, affording what is called pyrophorus.

* tar'-trim-ide, s. [Pref. tartr-, and Eng. imide.]

Chem.: $C_2H_2O(COHN) COHO$. A hypothetical substance of which the phenyl compound is known (tartranil).

* tar-trön'-ic, a. [Pref. tartr-; Eng. (keton)(e); -ic.] Derived from or containing tartaric acid.

tartaric-acid, s.

Chem.: $CH(OH)(COOH)_2$. Hydroxy-malic acid. Obtained by evaporating an aqueous solution of dinitro-tartaric acid, or by the action of nascent hydrogen on meso-oxalic acid. It crystallizes in large colourless prisms, soluble in water and alcohol, and melts at 180° with evolution of water and carbonic anhydride.

* tar'-trö-nyl, s. [Eng. tartron(ic); -yl.]

Chem.: The acid radical of tartaric acid.

* tartronyl-urea, s. [DIALURIC-ACID.]

* tar-tryl, s. [Eng. tartr(ate); -yl.]

Chem.: $C_4H_2O_2$. The radical of tartronic acid.

* tar-tryl'-ic, a. [Eng. tartryl; -ic.] Contained in or derived from tartryl (q.v.).

* tartryllic-acid, s. [TARTRIL-ACID.]

* tar-tüff', tar-tufe, s. [Fr. tartufe = hypocrite, from Molière's comedy Tartuffe, which is named after the principal character.] A hypocritical pretender; a hypocrite.

* tar-tüff'-ish, tar-tüf'-ish, a. [Eng. tartuff(e); -ish.] Hypocritical; rigid or precise in behaviour.

"She has some mother-in-law, or tartuffish aunt, or nonsensical old woman, to consult upon the occasion as well as myself."—Sterne.

* tar-tüff'-ism, s. [Eng. tartuff(e); -ism.] Hypocrisy.

† tas, s. [Fr.] A heap, a pile.

* tasco, s. [TASSE.]

* täs'-cö, s. [Etym. doubtful.] A sort of clay for making melting-pots.

täte, fät, färe, amidst, whät, fäll, father; wë, wët, hère, camel, hër, there; pine, pît, sire, sir, marine; gö, pöt, or, wöre, wölf, wörk, whö, sön; müte, öüb, öüre, ünite, öür, rüle, füll; trý, Sýrian. æ, œ = é; ey = ä; qu = kw.

tās-ōm-ō-tēr, s. Gr. tásis (tasis), genit. váras (tásis) = a stretching, a straining, and Eng. meter.

Physics: An instrument, invented by Steiner of Vienna, for measuring the strains to which the different parts of any structure may be submitted. It depends upon the tone given out by a wire or strip when stretched, the variation in length causing a change in the tone.

tās-sím-ō-tēr, s. [Gr. tásis (tasis) = stretching, tension, and Eng. meter.]

Physics: An instrument, invented by Edison, for measuring very minute variations of pressure, temperature, moisture, &c. It is founded on the discovery of the inventor that carbon, when pressed in the form of a button, affects the electric currents passing through the same, and offers a resistance which diminishes with the pressure. So sensitive is the carbon that, when this pressure varies to the amount of one-millionth part of an inch, the variation in the electric current passing through it will cause a proportional deflection of the galvanometer needle. The tasmeter is an outgrowth of Edison's experiments with that form of telephone with which he tried to vary the intensity of electric waves by means of the human voice; and its superiority to the thermopile may be thus exemplified: a hot iron placed a few inches from a thermopile will deflect the needle of an ordinary galvanometer about 1'; the human finger, held four inches from a tasmeter, will deflect the needle of a similar galvanometer 6'. The practical uses of the instrument are said to be: (1) Warning vessels of the approach of icebergs, by exposure to the air or to the water cooled by their vicinity; (2) Indicating otherwise inappreciable weights; (3) Recording pressures of air in motion, thus affording a useful addition to the anemometer.

tās-y-mōt-riō, o. [Eng. tasmeter; -ia.] Pertaining to, or determined by a tasmeter.

task, * taske, s. [O. Fr. tasque, tasche (Fr. idèle), from Low Lat. taxa = a tax, from Lat. taxo = to rate, double, tax (q.v.). Tax and task are thus doublets.]

1. A tax.

"Granted to the inhabitants thereof great freedom, and qv't them of al kyngyng taske or tribute." —Pisgyn: Chronycle, ch. cc.

2. Business or work imposed by another, generally a definite quantity or amount of work to be done; what duty or necessity imposes; duty or duties collectively.

"This my mean task." —Shakesp.: Tempest, III. 1.

3. Specifically, a lesson to be learnt; a portion of study imposed by a teacher.

4. Work undertaken; an undertaking.

"Dare to be wise; begin; for, once begun, your task is easy; half the work is done." —Francis: Horace; Ep. I. 2.

5. Burdensome employment; toil, labour.

"All with weary task fordons." —Shakesp.: Midsummer Night's Dream, v. 2.

¶ (1) At task: To be censured; blamed; taken to task. (Shakesp.)

(2) To take to task: (TAKE, v., ¶ 52.)

task-work, s.

1. Work imposed or performed as a task.

2. Work done by the job, as opposed to day-work or time-work.

task, v.t. [TASK, s.]

1. To impose a task upon; to assign a certain quantity or amount of labour, work, or business to.

"Obtains him and tasks him, and exacts his sweat with stripes." —Comper: Task, II. 23.

2. To oppress with excessive or severe labour or exertion; to occupy or engage fully, as with a task.

"Some things of weight task our thoughts." —Shakesp.: Henry V., I. 2.

* 3. To charge, to tax with.

* 4. To challenge, to summon, to command to do.

"To thy strong bidding, Task Ariel and all his quality." —Shakesp.: Tempest, I. 1.

* 5. To impose, to load.

"I dare not task my weakness with any more." —Shakesp.: Othello, II. 2.

task-ōr, s. [Eng. task, v.; -er.]

1. One who imposes a task or tasks; a taskmaster.

"To task the fowler." —Shakesp.: Love's Labour's Lost, II.

2. One who performs a task or piece of work or labour; in Scotland, often a labourer who receives his wages in kind.

"He is a good daysman, or journeyman, or tasker." —Ward: Sermons, p. 106.

task-ing, s. [Eng. task; -ing.] Task-work.

"We have done our tasking bravely, With the thews of Scottish men." —Blackie: Lays of Highlands, p. 102.

task-mas-tēr, s. [Eng. task, s., and master.]

One who imposes a task or tasks; one who assigns tasks to others and superintends their execution.

"Driven to madness by this usage, he killed his taskmaster." —Taylor: Words & Places (1878), ch. II.

* tās-lōt, s. [Eng. tasce; dimin. suff. -let.] A piece of armour for the thigh.

"Thigh-pieces of steel, then called taslets." —Scott: Legend of Montrose, p. 18.

Tās-mā-nī-ān, a. & s. [See def.]

A. As adj.: Of or pertaining to Tasmania or Van Diemen's Land.

B. As subst.: A native or inhabitant of Tasmania. The aboriginal Tasmanians have entirely vanished, as a result of European settlement, the last male dying in 1869, the last female in 1876. They were a race of low savages, far behind the Pacific Islanders generally in degree of development.

Tasmanian devil, s. A species of Dasyurus (Dasyurus ursinus) which is peculiarly savage and untamable. The Dasyurus are carnivorous marsupials which in Australia and Tasmania replace the placental carnivora of other regions. D. ursinus is about the size of a badger, with a large and broad head, and massive crowded teeth. The body is plump, with coarse, brownish-black fur, and a white band on the chest. These animals formerly committed great havoc among the poultry and even the sheep of the settlers in Tasmania, but are being driven out of the settled region. There are two other species in Tasmania, but are in size, being about the size of a cat. [NATIVE-DEVIL, USSINE-DASYURAE.]

Tasmanian fern-root, s. Pteris aquilina, a large species of Bracken, the rhizome of which was one of the principal articles of food of the Maoris of Tasmania before the British colonization of New Zealand. The roots, which are about an inch in circumference, were cut in pieces, dried and stacked. When wanted for use, the root was steeped in water, sun-dried, and roasted. By beating it on a stone mortar flour of a good quality was obtained.

Tasmanian sub-region, s.

Ichthy: A sub-region, established by ichthyologists, for the study of the distribution of fresh water fishes. It consists of Tasmania with a portion of South-eastern Australia.

Tasmanian wolf, s. A Tasmanian carnivorous marsupial of the family Dasyuridae, genus Thylacinus, one nearly allied to Dasyurus (TASMANIAN-DEVIL). There is one species only, T. cynocephalus, which is the largest extant marsupial carnivora. It is now restricted to Tasmania, where it is being rapidly exterminated by the sheep-herders, whose flocks it frequently ravages. It is rather smaller than a wolf, with a dog-like muzzle and long, tapering tail. In character it is very fierce and active, and is called "tiger," "wolf," and "hyena" by the settlers. [THYLACINUS.]

tās-man-ite, s. [After Tasmania, where found; suff. -ite (Min.).]

Mfn.: A name given by Church to some small discs, occurring thickly distributed through a laminated shale. Hardness, 2-0; sp. gr. 1.18; lustre, resinous; colour, reddish-brown. Insoluble in alcohol, ether, benzole, &c. Compos.: carbon, 79.21; hydrogen, 10.23; sulphur, 5.28; oxygen, 5.28 = 100. The name is more frequently, though erroneously, applied to the shale itself.

tās-mān-nī-a, s. [Named after Abel Janszen Tasman, who set sail on his great voyage of discovery on Aug. 14th, 1642. It is after him that the island of Tasmania is called.]

Bot.: A genus of Winterææ. Shrubs with simple, evergreen, entire, smooth, leathery, dotted leaves, with inconspicuous flowers, and small indehiscent fruit with shining black seeds. Tasmania aromatica, a native of Tasmania, is a handsome bush with dull purple branches. Every part is aromatic and pungent to the taste. The fruit is occasionally used as pepper.

tās, * tasse (1), s. [Fr. tasse.] A cup.

"Would you give Roh Campbell a tass of aqua vite if he lacked it?" —Scott: Rob Roy, ch. IV.

* tās-sar, s. [TUSSEK.]

* tāsse (2), * tās-sēt, s. [Fr. tasselte; dimin. from tasce = a pouch.]

Old Arm.: Armour for the thighs; one of a pair of appendages to the corselet, consisting of skirts of iron that covered the thighs. They were fastened to the cuirass with hooks.

"Their legs were armed with greaves, and their thighs with tasets." —North: Pictaræ, p. 372.

* tās-sel (1), * tās-tle (tle as sel), s. [O. Fr. tasel = a fastening, a clasp (Fr. tasseau = a bracket); Low Lat. tasselus = a tassel, from Lat. taxillum, accus. of taxillus = a small die, dimin. of talus = a knuckle bone, a die; Ital. tassello = a collar of a cloak, a square. A tassel was probably originally a sort of button made of a piece of squared bone, and afterwards of other materials. (Skeat.)]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. A sort of pendent ornament, consisting generally of a roundish mould covered with twisted threads of silk, wool, or the like, which hang down in a thick fringe. They are attached to the corners of cushions, curtains, walking-sticks, and such.

"Robes of fur, and bells of wampum, . . . Beautiful with bands and tassels." —Longfellow: Hiawatha, xi.

2. Anything resembling a tassel, as the pendent head or flower of some plants.

"From the tassels of the birch-tree." —Longfellow: Hiawatha, xviii.

3. A small ribbon of silk sewn to a book, to be placed between the leaves.

II. Arch.: A board beneath the mantel-piece.

tassel-grass, s.

Bot.: Ruppia maritima.

* tās-sel (2), s. [TIERCEL.]

* tassel-gentle, * tassel-gentle, s. A trained male goshawk or tiercel; a tiercel-gentle.

"Hist. Romeo, hist.—O, for a falconer's voice To lure this tassel-gentle back again!" —Shakesp.: Romeo & Juliet, II. 2.

* tās-sel (3), s. [TORSEL.]

* tās-sel (4), s. [TEASEL.]

* tās-sel (5), s. [TUSSEL.] (Scotch.)

* tās-sel, v.t. [TASSEL (1), s.] To adorn with tassels.

* tās-selled, * tās-siled, a. [Eng. tassel (1), s.; -ed.] Adorned with tassels.

"Ere . . . tassell'd horn Shakes the high thicket." —Milton: Arcades.

* tās-sic, s. [A dimin. from tass (q.v.).] A cup, a small vessel. (Scotch.)

* tās-tā-ble, a. [Eng. tast(e); -able.] Capable of being tasted; savoury, relishing.

"Their distilled oils are fluid, volatile, and tastable." —Boyle.

tāste, * taaste, * tast, v.t. & i. [O. Fr. taster = to taste or tast, to handle, to feel, to touch; Fr. tâter; Ital. tastare = to taste, to feel, to grope, to try, to probe. From a hypothetical Low Lat. taxito, a frequent, from Lat. taxo = to feel, to handle, from taxus, pa. par. of tango = to touch; Dut. & Ger. tasten = to touch, feel.]

A. Transitive:

* 1. To try by the touch; to handle, to feel; to try or prove by touching or feeling.

"I rede thee let this bond upon it falle And eat it weel, and ston thou shalt it find Sic that thou seest not with thine eye blind." —Chaucer: C. T., II. 970.

* 2. To try, to test.

"And he now began To taste the bow, the sharp shaft took, tugged hard." —Chapman: Homer: Odyssey xxi.

* 3. To become acquainted with by actual trial or experience; to experience, to undergo.

"Ther hee summe of hem that stonden heere, whiche schuten not taste deeth, till thei se manere some conynge in his kyngdom." —Wycliffe: Matt., xvi.

* 4. To understand; to become acquainted with.

"Acquaint thyself with God, if thou wouldest taste His works." —Comper: Task, v. 719.

batl, boy; poult, shōwl; cat, çell, chorus, çhin, bench; go, çem; thin, çhis; sin, aç; expect, Xenophon, exist. ph = f. -cian, -tian = çhan. -ion, -sion = shün; -tion, -çion = zhün. -cious, -çious, -sious = shūs, -ble, -dle, &c. = bel, del.

5. To participate in; to partake of. (Usually with an implied sense of pleasure or enjoyment.)

"Sweet's tasted here, and left as soon as known." Cooper: Task, I, 453.

6. To try by the touch of the tongue; to perceive the relish or flavour of by taking a small quantity into the mouth.

"They . . . put the glass to their lips, but having tasted the liquor, they returned it, with strong expressions of disgust."—Cook: First Voyage, bk. I, ch. 11.

7. To try by eating; to eat.

"I tasted a little of this honey."—I Samuel xiv. 29.

B. Intransitive:

1. To try food or drink by the mouth; to eat or drink a little by way of trial, so as to perceive the flavour; to try or test the flavour of food or drink.

2. To eat.

"Of this tree we may not taste or touch." Milton: P. L., ix. 651.

* 3. To have experience, perception, or enjoyment; to partake.

"Bound in these adamantine chain. The proud are taught to taste of pain." Gray: Hymn to Adversity.

* 4. To enjoy sparingly. (Followed by of.)

5. To have a smack or flavour; to have a particular quality, flavour, relish, or savour when applied to the tongue, palate, or other organ of taste; to smack. (Used absolutely before an adjective: as, It tastes bitter, sweet, &c.; followed by of before an object.)

"If your bitter tastes of brass, it is your master's fault, who will not allow a silver sauceman."—Swaff: Instruct. to Servants.

tāste, * tast, a. [TAST, v.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. The act of tasting; gustation.

"The fruit Of that forbidden tree, whose mortal taste Brought death into the world and all our woe." Milton: P. L., I, 1.

2. That sense by which we perceive the characteristic or distinctive relish or savour of anything when brought into contact with special organs situated in the mouth. (II.)

"The organ of taste is the tongue and palate."—Locke: Nat. Philos., ch. xi.

3. A particular sensation excited by certain bodies, which are called sapid, when brought into contact with the tongue, palate, &c., and moistened with saliva; flavor, savor.

"It begins to bolle like new wine, & to be sower and sharpe of taste."—Buckluyt: Voyages, I, 97.

4. Power of appreciating or distinguishing between the flavour of different substances.

"For thou of love hast lost thy tast I see, As sickle man hath of sweet and bitterness." Chaucer: Assemblie of Fowles.

5. Intellectual relish or discernment; appreciation, liking and inclination. (Formerly followed by of, now by for: as, a taste for music, a taste for chemistry, &c.)

6. Nice perception, or the power of perceiving and relishing excellence in human performances; the power of appreciating the finer qualities of art, as exhibited by the practical artist, or felt by the amateur or connoisseur; the faculty of discerning beauty, order, congruity, proportion, symmetry, or whatever constitutes excellence, particularly in the fine arts or literature; that faculty of the mind by which we both perceive and enjoy whatever is beautiful or sublime in the works of nature and art. The possession of taste insures grace or beauty in the works of an artist, and the avoidance of all that is low or mean. It is as often the result of an innate sense of beauty or propriety as of art-education, and no genius can compensate for the want of it.

7. Manner with respect to what is pleasing; the pervading air, choice of circumstances, or general arrangement in any work of art, by which taste on the part of the artist or author is evinced; style.

"Taste is, perhaps, his only director. Taste in writing is the exhibition of the greatest quantity of beauty and of use that may be admitted into any description without counteracting each other."—Goldsmith: Pottle Learning, ch. vii.

8. Manner with respect to what is becoming, proper, refined, or in accordance with the laws of politeness and good society: as, That remark is not in good taste.

* 9. The act of feeling or experiencing.

"I have almost forgot the taste of tears." Shakesp.: Macbeth, v. 3.

10. Trial, experiment, essay, proof, specimen.

"Have we not had a taste of his obedience?" Shakesp.: Coriolanus, III, 1.

11. A small portion given as a specimen or sample; a little piece or bit tasted, eaten, or drunk.

II. Technically:

1. Physiol.: The specific organs producing the sense of taste are the endings of the glossopharyngeal and lingual nerves in the mucous membrane of the tongue and palate, the tongue and lips acting as subsidiary organs by bringing the sapid substances into contact with the mucous membrane of the mouth. It is not yet decided whether the taste-buds (q.v.) are apical organs of taste. The tastes thus cognizable are broadly classified into acid, saline, bitter, and sweet. It is essential to the development of taste that the substance brought in contact with the tongue be dissolved, and the effect is greatest when its temperature is about 40°. The relative position of the nostrils and the mouth ensures that nothing can enter the latter without sending into the former some of the odorous particles which may exist in the substance swallowed, and the impressions received through the organs of taste and smell are so blended together as to become one. No special organ of taste has been discovered in invertebrate animals; and it seems probable that among the vertebrates it rises with the advance of organization, reaching its full development in man. The tongue is covered on its sides and upper portions by little vascular projections termed papillae, some being pointed, others rounded. These are visible to the naked eye as little sharp or rounded projections. In the cat tribe the papillae are hard and curved backwards, the animal using its tongue as a scraper to remove the flesh from the bones of its prey. At the back of the tongue are eight or ten papillae of a different character, and arranged in the form of a V, with its opening forwards. In the trenches between them a watery fluid is secreted, keeping them always moist, while in their epithelium are the taste-buds, or taste-buds. These are believed by most physiologists to be the organs of taste. No substance has a taste except one capable of solution, though not all soluble substances have a taste. It is perhaps some chemical action of the food material dissolved in the saliva, upon the nerve ends of the taste-buds, that yields the sensation of taste. Much of what we call taste is really smell, an odor ascending to the olfactory nerves, and mingling its sensation with that of the gustatory nerves. Sugar, salt, quinine, and some acids are devoid of smell, and we can distinguish them by the taste alone, they yielding the tastes of sweet, salt, bitter, and sour. But meat, wine, and fruit add to the sensations of taste which they may produce others derived from the smell, and to the latter their peculiarities of flavor are due. A bad cold dulls our appreciation of these articles of diet. The odorous emanations from the food readily pass upward from the mouth into the nasal passages, and affect the nerves of smell. To the taste sensations mentioned may perhaps be added the alkaline, astringent, and metallic, though it is questionable if these are properly tastes. Yet if all these be considered, the effects of taste still greatly lack the variety of those of smell, in which numerous shades of variety can be detected. There is reason to believe that each taste is most acutely felt on some special locality of the tongue. That of bitter, for instance, does not seem discernible until the bitter principle reaches the back of the mouth, while the sweet and acid tastes seem most easily distinguished by the front part of the tongue.

2. Psychol.: Tastes differ so much among individuals, nations, or in different ages and conditions of civilization, that it is utterly impossible to set up a standard of taste applicable to all men and to all stages in the evolution of society. (1) Taste, in a material sense, is applicable to every object that can be applied to the organ of taste, and to every degree and manner in which the organ can be affected; some things are tasteless, other things have a strong taste, and others a mixed taste. The flavor is the predominating taste, and consequently is applied to such objects as may have a different kind or degree of taste; an apple may not only have the general taste of apple, but also a flavor peculiar to itself; the flavor is commonly said of that which is good, as a fine flavor, a delicious flavor; but it may designate that which is not always agreeable, as the flavor of fish, which is unpleasant in things that do not admit of such a taste.

(2) He who derives particular pleasure from any art may be said to have a taste for it; he who makes very great proficiency in the theory and practice of any art may be said to have a genius for it. One may have a taste without having genius, but it would not be possible to have genius for a thing without having a taste for it.

taste-bud, a.

Anat. (Pl.): Ovoidal or flask-shaped bodies discovered by Loven and Schwabe on the surface of the tongue. They are believed to be special organs of taste. Their lower parts are in contact with the corium, the upper ones appear as pores. Each taste-bud looks like a flask-shaped barrel, its walls lined with cells placed side by side like the staves of a cask. Each opens by a little pore outwardly, while a nerve enters into the deeper part. The sensory cells within the cask or bud are much elongated, each ending in a tiny bristle which projects from the pore into the trench of the papilla. From the opposite end of this cell a delicate nerve enters the nerve trunk which passes from the bud to the brain. The protruding hairs are kept moist by a glandular secretion and by whatever sapid substances may be present, and probably convey inward the sensory impressions received from these substances. It is almost certain that these buds are organs of taste, but it is not sure that they are the only organs. As yet much is to be learned concerning the terminations of the nerves in the tongue epithelium.

* tāst-ēd, a. [Eng. tast(ed); -ed.] Having a particular taste or relish.

"Coleworts are watered . . . to be better tasted, if they be sometimes wreted with salt-water."—Bacon: Nat. Hist., § 460.

tät-tie, s. [Hind. tatti; Maharratta tati = a mat. See def.] A screen made of split bamboo placed vertically in doors and windows in India (the window frames being temporarily taken out) while the dry hot wind is blowing during April, May, and June. A native with a pall of water stands outside drenching the mat, so that every interstee has a drop of water. As the dry wind flows into the house through these drops, evaporation takes place with such speed as to cool the wind, which enters the house at a temperature quite refreshing. A single pane of glass is sometimes placed in the window tattie to afford the inmates of the room a small amount of light. When the hot season is succeeded by the rainy season, the tatties are succeeded, as the wind is already saturated with moisture, and the temperature does not require to be artificially reduced. (Anglo-Indian.)

"A black, a tawny-moor, and a Frenchman." — Cervantes: Bold Stroke for a Wife, I. 1.

Ornith. : Syrnium stridula (Aluco flammea). [STRIZ, 2.]

*táv-ný, v.t. [TAWNY, a.] To tan.

"The sunne so soone the palated face will tawny." — Breton: Mother's Blessing, p. 8.

táv-pié, s. [TAUPIE.]

távz, távze, s. [A.S. tawian = to beat, to scourge.] A leather strap, usually with a slit or fringe-like end, used as an instrument of punishment by schoolmasters and others. (Scotch.)

távz, *táze, s. [Fr. taze = a taxation, from tazer = to tax, to rate, to assess, from Lat. taxo = to handle . . . to rate, to value; Low Lat. taxa = a rating, a taxation. Taxo is for tacto, from tactus, pa. par. of tangere = to touch. Tax and task are doublets; Sp. tasa; Port. taxa; Ital. tassa.]

1. A contribution imposed by authority upon people to meet the expenses of government or other public services.

(2) A government imposition, or charge made by the state on the income or property of individuals, or on products consumed by them. A tax is said to be direct when it is demanded from the very persons who it is intended or desired should pay it, as a poll-tax, income-tax, property-tax, taxes for keeping men-servants, dogs, &c. An indirect tax is one demanded from one person, who is expected and intended to recoup or indemnify himself at the expense of another, as customs and excise duties.

¶ The character of taxes differs greatly in different countries, the bulk of modern taxes being indirect, though direct taxation is retained to a considerable degree. In Britain the income tax is the source of an important part of the revenue. In this country an income tax was collected during and for some time after the Civil War, and an attempt to revive it was unsuccessfully made in 1894 [TARRIF]. As a rule national taxation in our country has been indirect, the revenue being raised by custom duties and internal taxes. In state and municipal taxation, on the contrary, direct taxes are often imposed, municipal funds being largely produced by taxation of real estate. The advocates of what is known as "single tax" favor the raising of all revenue by a tax on land values.

"Poets, of all men, ever least regret Increasing taxes and the nation's debt."
Cooper: Table Talk, 177.

(2) A rate or sum imposed upon individuals for municipal, county, or other local purposes, as police taxes, taxes for the repairs of roads, bridges, &c., poor-rates, drainage-rates, &c.

2. A disagreeable or burdensome duty or charge; as an oppressive demand or exaction; a requisition; as, This is a heavy tax on his time and strength.

- * 3. A task; a lesson to be learnt.
- * 4. Charge, censure.

"He could not without grief of heart, and without some tax upon himself and his ministers for the not executing the laws, look upon the bold licence of some pamphlets."—Clarendon.

¶ Tax applies to or implies whatever is paid by the people to this Government, according to a certain estimate; the customs are a species of tax which are less specific than other taxes, being regulated by custom rather than any definite law; the customs apply particularly to what was customarily given by merchants for the goods which they imported from abroad. The predominant idea in contribution is that of common consent, it supposes a degree of freedom in the agent which is incompatible with the exercise of authority expressed by the other terms: hence the term is with more propriety applied to those cases in which men voluntarily unite in giving towards any particular object; as charitable contributions, or contributions in support of a war; but it may be taken in the general sense of a forced payment, as in speaking of military contribution.

tax-cart, taxed-cart, s. A light spring-cart on which only a low rate of tax is charged.

tax-free, a. Exempt or free from taxation.

tax-gatherer, s. A collector of taxes.
"The Protestant ministers were harassed by the tax-gatherer."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. vi.

tax-payer, s. One who is assessed to, and pays taxes.

tax, v.t. [Tax, a.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. To impose a tax or taxes on; to subject to the payment of taxes; to levy taxes or other contributions from for state or local purposes.

"Taxing her mind to aid her eyes."
Scott: Bridal of Ferriemont, ll. 4.

4. To charge, to censure, to accuse. (Followed by for or with (more generally the latter) before an indirect object, and formerly also by of: as, To tax a man with falsehood.)

"She confesses the truth of her husband's accusation; but she taxes the serpent as her seducer."—Sp. Borley's Sermons, vol. ii., ser. 16.

II. Law: To go through and allow or disallow the items of charge in.

"A returning officer, whose bill of costs has been taxed on the application of the candidate."—Daily Telegraph, Dec. 24, 1855.

tax-a-bil-i-ty, s. [Eng. taxable; -ity.] The quality or state of being taxable.

tax-a-ble, a. [Eng. tax; -able.] Liable to be taxed; capable of being taxed; subject to taxation.

"Leave America, if she has taxable matter in her, to tax herself."—Burke: American Taxation.

* tax-a-ble-ness, s. [Eng. taxable; -ness.] The quality or state of being taxable; tax-ability.

* tax-a-ble, adv. [Eng. taxable(ly); -ly.] In a taxable manner.

tax-a'-ō-se, s. [Lat. tax(us); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -accē.]

Bot.: Taxids; an order of Gymnogens. Trees or shrubs with continuous inarticulated branches, the wood with circular disks. Leaves evergreen, generally narrow, rigid, entire, veinless, alternate or distichous, sometimes dilated and lobed, in which case the veins are forked and of equal thickness. Flowers dioecious, naked, surrounded by imbricated bracts. Males having several stamens; filaments usually monadelphous. Female solitary, ovules naked, the foramen at the apex, the outer skin finally becoming hard. Pericarp imperfect, usually cup-shaped, acculent; embryo, dicotyledonous. Known genera nine, species fifty. (Urnaley.)

tax'-ād, s. [Lat. tax(us); Eng. suff. -ad.] Bot. (PL): Lindley's name for Taxaceæ (q.v.).

tax-ā-tion, s. [Fr., from Lat. taxationem, accus. of taxatio, from taxatio, pa. par. of taxo = to handle . . . to tax (q.v.); Ital. taxazione.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. The act of imposing a tax or taxes on the subjects of a state or government, or on the members of a corporation or company by the proper authority, for the raising of revenue to meet the expense of public services; the system by which such revenue is raised.

"There are two different circumstances, which render the interest of money a much less proper subject of direct taxation than the rent of land."—Smith: Wealth of Nations, bk. v., ch. ii.

2. A tax or assessment imposed; the aggregate of particular taxes.

"The taxation by that way of assessment seemed greater then in old time."—Camden: Hist. Elizabeth (an. 1590).

* 3. Demand, claim.

"I bring no overture of war, no taxation of homage."—Shakespeare: Twelfth Night, l. 4.

* 4. Charge, censure, accusation, scandal.

"My father's love is enough to honour; speak no more of him, you'll be whipt for taxation one of these days."—Shakespeare: As You Like It, l. 2.

II. Law: The act of taxing or examining a bill of costs in law.

* tax-a-tive-ly, adv. [Tax.] As a tax.
"If these ornaments or furniture had been put taxatively, and by way of limitation, such a thing bequeathed as a legacy shall not be paid, if it wants ornaments or furniture."—Argyle's Parergon.

taxed, pa. par. or a. [Tax, v.]

taxed-cart, s. A tax-cart (q.v.).

tax'-el, s. [Late Lat. taxus = a badger.]

Zool.: Taxidea americana, the American badger. The snout is shorter and more hairy than that of the European badger; the body of a whitish colour, sometimes shaded with gray or tawny. Length, excluding the tail, about twenty-four inches, tail six inches. It abounds on the plains watered by the Missouri, but its southern range is not exactly defined. It appears to be more carnivorous than the European species.

tax'-er, s. [Eng. tax, v.; -er.]

1. One who taxes.

"For the first of these I am a little to alter their name; for instead of taxers, they become taxers; instead of taking provision for your majesty's service, they tax your people ad redemptionem vexationem."—Bacon: Speech Touching Purveyors.

2. In Cambridge University, one of the officers chosen yearly to regulate the assize of bread, and see the true gauge of weights and measures observed; a taxor.

tax'-i-arch, s. [Gr. τάξιάρχης (taxiarchēs), from τάξις (taxis) = a division of an army, and ἀρχή (archē) = to rule.]

Gr. Antiq.: An Athenian military officer commanding a taxis or battalion.

tax'-i-corn, s. [TAXICORNÆ.] A beetle belonging to the order Tetracornæ (q.v.).

tax'-i-cor'-nēs, s. pl. [Gr. τάξις (taxis) = arranging, and Lat. cornu = a horn.]

Entom.: The second family of Lestrellie's Heteromera. They are all winged; the body is for the most part square, with the thorax concealing or receiving the head; antennæ short, more or less perfoliate or grained; the legs adapted for walking. They live in fungi, beneath the bark of trees, or on the ground under stones. Tribes, Diaperales and Cossypeneæ.

tax-id'-ō-a, s. [Late Lat. tax(us) = a badger, and Gr. είδος (eidōs) = form; cf. Lat. taxonius = pertaining to a badger (according to Smith, probably from the Celtic name of the badger; Gr. δοξός = a badger.)]

Zool.: A genus of Melinæ; with one, or perhaps two species. Taxidea americana (Taxideria) is the Common American Badger of the United States. T. berlandieri, the Mexican Badger, is possibly only a local variety. [TAXEL.]

tax'-i-dēr'-mīa, a. [Eng. taxiderm(y); -ia.] Of or pertaining to taxidermy.

tax'-i-dēr'-mīst, s. [Eng. taxiderm(y); -ist.] One who is skilled in taxidermy; one who prepares, preserves, and attuffs the skins of animals.

"A seven-pounder, which at the present moment is being set up by a Reading taxidermist."—Field, June 4, 1857.

tax'-i-dēr'-mỹ, s. [Gr. τάξις (taxis) = order, arrangement, and δέρμα (derma) = skin.] The art of preparing and preserving the skins of animals, and also of stuffing and mounting them, so as to cause them to resemble the living forms as nearly as possible.

tax'-in, s. [Lat. tax(us) = a yew-tree; -in.]

Chem.: A resinous substance extracted from the leaves of the yew-tree by treatment with alcohol containing tartaric acid. It is slightly soluble in water, soluble in alcohol, ether, and dilute acids, and precipitated from acid solutions by alkalis in white bulky flocks.

tax'-in'-ō-se, s. pl. [Lat. tax(us); fem. pl. adj. suff. -iēs.]

Bot.: A tribe of Conifereæ, founded by Richard. Flowers dioecious; cones much reduced; scales small, thin, or coriaceous, the upper with one ovule. Seed hard, with a fleshy coat, or seated in a fleshy cup. Pollen globose. (Sir J. Hooker.)

tax'-ing, pr. par. or a. [Tax, v.]

taxing-master, s.

Law: An officer of a court of law, who examines bills of costs, and allows or disallows charges.

tax'-is, s. [Gr. = order, arrangement; τάσσω (tasōō), fut. τάσω (tasōō) = to set in order.]

1. Ancient Arch.: That disposition which assigns to every part of a building its just dimensions. It is synonymous with Ordinance in modern architecture.

2. Greek Antiq.: A division of troops corresponding in some respects to the modern battalion.

3. Surg.: An operation by which those parts which have quitted their natural situation are replaced by the hand without the assistance of instruments, as in reducing hernia, &c.

tax'-i-tēs, s. [Gr. τάξος (taxos) = a yew tree; suff. -itēs.]

Palæobot.: A genus of plants akin to Taxus (q.v.). Two species from the Lower Jurassic, two from the Eocene, and one or more from the Oligocene.

* tax'-lēs, a. [Eng. tax; -less.] Free or exempt from taxes or taxation.

"More recently, when a dooked-tail colley was tax-less."—Field, Feb. 27, 1856.

tax'-ō-crī-nī-dæ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. taxocrinæ(us); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -idæ.]

Palæont.: A family of Crinoidea. Basals three, very small; five subradial or parbasal pieces supporting three to seven circles of radials; Silurian to the Carboniferous.

tax'-ō-crī-nūs, s. [Gr. τάξος (taxos) = a yew, and κρίνον (krinon) = a lily.]

Palæont.: The typical genus of Taxocrinidæ Upper Silurian and Carboniferous.

tax'-ō-dī-tēs, s. [Mod. Lat. taxod(ium); suff. -itēs.]

Palæobot.: A genus of Cupressææ, akin to Taxodium.

tax'-ō-dī-ūm, s. [Lat. taxus = a yew, and Gr. είδος = form.]

fāte, fāt, fāre, amidst, whāt, fāll, fāther; wē, wēt, hēre, camēl, hēr, thēre; pīne, pīt, sīre, sīr, marine; gō, pāt, or, wōre, wōlf, wōrk, whō, sōn; mūte, cūb, cūre, unīto, cūr, rāle, fūll; trỹ, Sýrian. æ, œ = ē; ey = ā; qu = kw.

1. Bot. : A genus of Cupressae. Taxodium distichum, the Deciduous Cypress, is stimulating and diuretic.

2. Palaeobot. : From the Cretaceous and Great Lignite of North America onward.

tax'-ô-dôn, s. [Late Lat. tax(us) = a badger; suff. -odon.] [TAXIDEA.]

Palaeont. : A genus of Mustelidae, with affinities to the Badgers and the Otters, from the Miocene of Western Europe.

* tax-ô-ô-ô-y, s. [Gr. τάξις (taxis) = order, arrangement, and λόγος (logos) = a word, a discourse.] The same as TAXONOMY (q.v.).

tax-ô-nôm'-îo, a. [Eng. taxonom(y); -ia.] Pertaining to or involving taxonomy or systematic classification.

tax-ôn'-ô-mý, s. [Gr. τάξις = order, arrangement, and νόμος (nomos) = law.]

1. That department of natural history which treats of the laws and principles of classification.

2. The laws and principles which govern classification.

* We must learn something of the arrangement and classification of living beings—i. e., of the science of taxonomy. —St. George Mivart: The Cat, ch. i., § 11.

tax-or, s. [Eng. tax, v.; -or.] The same as TAXER, s. (q.v.).

tax-ôx'-yî-ôn, s. [Gr. τάξος (taxis) = the yew tree, and ξύλον (xylon) = wood.]

Palaeobot. : A genus of Coniferae with wood like that of the Taxus (q.v.). Found with Taxitea in the Lower Oligocene.

tax'-ûs, s. [Lat., from Gr. τάξος (taxis) = a yew tree.]

Bot. : Yew; the typical genus of Taxaceae or Taxineae. Fruit drupeaceous, composed of a cup-shaped, fleshy receptacle, with dry empty scales at its base, surrounding a naked bony seed. Only known species Taxus baccata, the Common Yew. [Yew.] Taxus fastigiata, the Irish or Florence Court Yew, is a variety of this species.

* Tâ-yg'-ô-tê, s.
Astron. : One of the Pleiades.

Tây-lôr, s. [See def. of compound.]

Taylor's theorem, s.

Math. : A theorem discovered by Dr. Brook Taylor, and published by him in 1715. Its object is to show how to develop a function of the algebraic sum of two variables into a series arranged according to the ascending powers of one of the variables, with coefficients which are functions of the other. Taylor's formula is as follows—

$$f(x+y) = u + \frac{du}{dx}y + \frac{d^2u}{dx^2} \frac{y^2}{1.2} + \frac{d^3u}{dx^3} \frac{y^3}{1.2.3} + \frac{d^4u}{dx^4} \frac{y^4}{1.2.3.4} + \dots$$

In which the first member is any function of the sum of two variables, and u is that that function becomes when the leading variable y is made equal to 0. It fails to develop a function in the particular case in which u, or any of its successive differential coefficients, becomes infinite for any particular value of the variable which enters them. It only fails for the particular value, holding good for all other values.

Tây-lôr-ism, s. One of the modified phases of Calvinism developed in the orthodox Congregational churches of New England.

tây-lôr-ite, s. [After J. W. Taylor, who analysed it; suff. -ite (Min.).]

Min. : A mineral found in small concretions having crystalline structure, in the guano-beds of the Chincha Islands. Hardness, 2.0; colour, yellowish-white; taste, pungent and bitter. Compos. : sulphuric acid, 47.8; potash, 47.0; ammonia, 5.2 = 100, which is equivalent to the formula $\frac{1}{2}(\text{K})_2\text{O} + \frac{1}{2}\text{NH}_4\text{O} + \text{SO}_3$.

tây-ra, s. [Native name.]

Zool. : Galera barbata, a small carnivorous mammal, about the size of a marten, from tropical America. Its colour is uniform black, slightly tinged with brown, with a white patch on the throat and upper part of the chest.

tâ-zel, s. [TEASEL.]

tâz-nîte, s. [After Tazna, Bolivia, where found; suff. -ite (Min.).]

Min. : An amorphous mineral with somewhat fibrous structure, sometimes earthy; colour, yellow. It is of apparently uncertain composition, but is regarded as an arseno-antimonate of bismuth, analogous to bismuthite (q.v.), and requires further examination.

taz'-ze (first z s t), s. [Ital.] A flat cup with a foot and handle.

T-bând-age (age as îg), s. [The letter T, and Eng. bandage.]

Surg. : A bandage shaped like the letter T, consisting of a strip of linen attached at right angles to another strip. When two such strips are so attached it is a double T. Used in supporting dressings in diseases of the perinaeum, groin, &c.

* T-beard, s. [The letter T, and Eng. beard.] A beard cut in the shape of a T.

tçha'-lan (t silent), s. [Chinese.] A blue powder containing copper, used by the Chinese for producing blue colours on porcelain.

tçhër-nô-zêm (t silent), s. [Rus.]

Geol. : A black soil of a particularly rich character, extending at intervals from the Volga to near the mouth of the Danube, and even to Podolia and East Galicia. It is analogous to the regur of India. In the opinion of Sir Roderick Murchison (Russia, &c., p. 597), who brought it to the notice of English geologists, it is of aqueous origin.

tçhër-wër-tâk (t silent, w as v), s. [Rus.] A Russian silver coin worth 25 copecks, or about 94d. sterling.

tçhiok (t silent), s. [See def.]

1. A sound produced by pressing the tongue against the roof of the mouth, and withdrawing it suddenly; used to quicken a lazy horse.

2. An exclamation of surprise or of contempt.

Tçhû'-dî (t silent), s. [Rus.] A name given by the Russians to the Finnic race in the north-west of Russia. It is now more generally applied to designate the group of people of which the Finns, the Estonians, the Livonians, and the Laplanders are members.

Tçhû'-diô (t silent), a. [TCHUDI.] Of or pertaining to the Tchudi; specif., designating that group of Turanian tongues spoken by the Finns, Estonians, Livonians, and Laplanders.

tea, *teô, *cha, *chau, s. [Chinese tê, ch'a, ts'a; Fr. thé; Ger. thee; Ital. tea; Malay tèh. Formerly pronounced tay; Pope used it to rhyme with obey (Rape of the Lock, iii. 7), away (Id. i. 62), and stay (Basset Table, 27), though in the last-named poem (112) he makes it rhyme with decree.]

1. Chem. & Comm. : The prepared leaves of Thea sinensis, an evergreen closely allied to the Camellia family. The leaves are gathered four times during the year, the tea prepared from the first or spring gathering being the most delicate in colour and flavour. Formerly it was supposed that black and green teas were prepared from the leaves of different plants, but it is now known that both varieties are obtained from the same plant, the differences depending on the mode of preparation. In preparing green teas the leaves are gently heated in drying-pans, to render them soft and flaccid, then rolled by the hand on a wooden table, this operation being repeated several times as quickly as possible, to prevent fermentation and preserve the green colour. The leaves intended for black tea are placed in heaps to undergo fermentation. At the end of three or four hours they are tossed about and beaten by the hand until they become soft. They are next heated in an iron pan, and rolled into balls by the hand, this operation being repeated several times; lastly, the leaves are slowly dried over a charcoal fire. The two great classes of tea, green and black, are each subdivided into a variety of kinds, known in commerce by particular names. Thus, in green teas there are Gunpowder, Hyson, Young Hyson, Imperial, Twankay, &c.; and in black teas, Congou, Kaisow, Moning, Souehong, Assam, &c. The most important soluble organic substance existing in tea are an alkaloid theine (q.v.), an essential oil present in very small quantity, and to which the peculiar aroma of the tea is said to be due, and tannic acid. Green tea contains on an average 26 per cent. of tannic acid, black tea about 15 per cent.

Tea must not be regarded as a nutrient in the sense of supplying material to build up wasted tissue, or to generate heat, but it is chiefly prized on account of its refreshing and stimulating properties, and its power of engendering activity of thought, and driving away sleep. Taken in excess it is apt to produce giddiness and nervousness. At one time there was no article so generally adulterated as tea, both in China and in the countries where used; but since the price has decreased this has almost entirely ceased. It is now of rare occurrence that quarts or sauds, foreign leaves, or exhausted tea leaves are found mixed with tea, or that colouring matter is discovered to have been used in faking green tea. The only sophistication carried on at the present time is the mixing of cheap low-classed teas with those of a higher value.

2. Hist. : Tea was used in China from early times, and is mentioned as a common beverage in that country by Soliman, an Arabian merchant, who wrote an account of his travels thither about A.D. 850. The first mention of it by a European was by Bolero in 1590. About 1610 the Dutch first brought it to England, and during the next fifty years its price varied from £6 to £10 per pound. In 1660 a tax of 8d. per gallon of tea prepared for sale was imposed. On Sept. 25, 1661, Pepsy sent for a cup of tea, "a Chinese drink" which he had never tasted before. In 1664 the East India Company purchased 2 lb. 2 oz. of tea to present to Charles II. By 1660 the price had fallen to 60s. per pound. In 1678 the Company imported 4,713 lbs. which was the commencement of their tea trade. In 1699 a duty was imposed of 5s. per pound, and five per cent. on the value of the tea-leaf. In 1728 black tea cost 15s. to 20s. per pound, and green tea 12s. to 30s. The imposition of a duty on tea imported into America in 1767 led to the destruction of many boxes of it in Boston and New York, and brought on the American War of Independence. At present Great Britain is the great tea-consuming country, the annual consumption of tea in that country nearly equalling that of the United States and the various nations of Europe combined. In this country it is largely replaced by coffee, the consumption of tea being less than half that of Britain. Tea is now raised in other countries than China, notably in Japan, whose exportation is large, and in India and Ceylon, in which the cultivation began about 1840. The crop in these countries is now large.

3. The evening meal, at which tea is generally served. Also, an afternoon social gathering at which the guests are served with tea and other refreshments.

¶ High tea : A similar gathering, at which hot meats and other substantial viands are served.

4. A decoction or infusion of the leaves of the tea-plant in boiling-water, used as a beverage, generally mixed with milk or cream, and sweetened with sugar.

"Women sitting in the streets, and selling dishes of tea hot and ready made; they call it chau, and even the poorest people sip it." —Dampier: Voyages (an. 1687).

5. An infusion or decoction of vegetables for drinking: as, sage-tea, camomile-tea, &c.

6. A soup or extract of beef: as, beef-tea.
¶ Paraguay tea : [PARAGUAY TEA.]

tea-berry, s.

Bot. : Gaultheria procumbens.

* tea-board, s. A tray-shaped board on which tea-things were set.

tea-caddy, s. A small box for holding the tea used in households. [CADDY, TEA-CHEST, 2.]

tea-cake, s. A light kind of cake eaten with tea.

tea-canister, s. A canister or box in which tea is kept.

tea-chest, s.

1. A slightly-formed box, usually covered with Chinese characters and figures, and lined with thin sheet-lead, in which tea is sent from China.

2. (See extract).

"A lady of advanced age tells me that what is called a tea-caddy now was formerly called a tea-chest, and that the smaller boxes inside it were called caddies." —Notes & Queries, Ap. 16, 1867, p. 208.

hól, bôy; pout, jôwî; cat, çell, chorus, çhin, bench; go, çom; thin, çhis; sin, aç; expect, Xenophon, exist. -îng. -clan, -tian = çhan. -tion, -sion = çhün. -çion, -çion = çhün. -çious, -çious, -çious = çhüs. -çlie, -çlie, &c. = çel çel.

tea-cloth, s. A cloth used in washing up tea-things.

tea-cup, s. A small cup to drink tea from.

¶ A storm in a teacup: A great disturbance about a trifling matter; much ado about nothing.

tea-ouful, s. As much as a teacup will hold.

tea-dealer, s. One who deals in or sells tea; a tea-merchant.

tea-drinker, s. One who drinks tea; specif., one who uses tea as a beverage habitually or in preference to any other.

tea-garden, s. A garden, attached to a place of entertainment, where tea is served.

tea-kettle, s. A ordinary piece of stove furniture for boiling water for making tea, &c.

Tea-kettle broth: Bread cut in small dice and soaked in hot water, to which butter, pepper, and salt are added.

tea-lead, s. Thin sheet-lead used to line the chests in which tea is sent over from China.

tea-oil, s.

1. An excellent table oil expressed from the seeds of Camellia oleifera, growing in China.

2. The oil of the tea-plant (q.v.).

tea-party, s. A social gathering at which the partaking of tea is nominally the chief feature.

tea-plant, s.

Bot. & Hort.: Thea sinensis, or chinensis, from which T. assamica is not distinct. Griffith called it Camellia theifera. It is wild in Assam; and possibly so in China, though the exact locality may be unknown, or the Chinese cultivated plant may have come originally from Assam. Formerly Thea viridis and Thea Bohea were believed to be two distinct species, now they are regarded as varieties only. T. sinensis, var. viridis, is a large shrub with spreading branches, thin, nearly membranous, broadly lanceolate, light green, wavy leaves, with irregular serratures, and large, usually solitary, flowers. It was introduced into England in 1768. T. sinensis, var. Bohea, is a smaller plant, with an erect stem; elliptical, flat, coriaceous, dark green leaves, with small serratures. It is not so hardy as the former variety. T. sinensis, var. asamitica, is a shrub with thin gray bark, large leaves, and one to five flowers on a twig. It is cultivated in Assam, Darjeeling, Cachar, Chittagong, the Nilgiri hills, Ceylon, &c. An oil is made in India from the seeds. It is not suitable for food or for lights, but can be used in the manufacture of soap.

1. Bot.: Tectona grandis. A large tree, with leaves from one to two feet long by eight to sixteen inches broad; wild in Central and Southern India and in Burmah, and cultivated in Assam, Bengal, and the Sub-Himalayas as far north as Saharunpoor. The leaves yield a red dye, and the wood an oil used medicinally and, either alone or mixed with resin, is employed as a varnish for woodwork. A resin exudes from the bark. The flowers and seeds are diuretic, and the bark astringent.

2. Comm.: Its timber. The sapwood is white and mealy; the heart-wood, when cut green, has a pleasant and strong aromatic fragrance, and is of a beautiful dark golden-yellow colour, which on seasoning darkens into brown, mottled with darker streaks. It is exceedingly strong, and weighs about 40 lb. per cubic foot. It does not split, crack, warp, shrink, or alter its shape when once seasoned; contact with iron does not injure it, nor is it attacked by white ants; these qualities arising, perhaps, from the aromatic oil which it contains. It is easily worked, and takes a good polish, and is the most valuable timber known in India and Burmah, being used for house and shipbuilding, furniture, sleepers, &c., and largely exported for shipbuilding and for the construction of railway carriages. (Calcutta Exhib. Rep.)

téa-zle, *tea-el, s. [A.S. tésl, tésel, from téscan = to tease (q.v.).]

1. Botany, &c.:

(1) The genus Dipsacus (q.v.). The order Dipsaceæ, to which the Teasels belong, has in all five genera and about 125 species, all natives of the temperate region of the Eastern Hemisphere. In the genus Dipsacus the flowers bél, bóy; póút, jówł; oat, çell, chorus, çhin, bench; go, gem; thin, this; sin, aş; expect, Xenophon, exist. ph = f -clan, -tian = shan. -tion, -sion = shün; -tion, -sion = zhün. -cious, -tious, -siuous = shüs. -ble, -dle, &c. = bəl, del.

are separated from each other by long, stiff, prickly-pointed bracts, to which its economical value is due. Of the several species the only one of any value is Dipsacus fullonum, the Fuller's or Clothier's Teasel, so called from its usefulness in the preparation of cloth. It is a biennial, several feet high, with sessile, serrated leaves, the stem and leaves prickly; and with cylindrical heads of pale or white flowers, between which are oblong, rigid bracts, hooked at the point. These are used in woolen factories and elsewhere for raising the nap on cloth. It grows wild on road-sides and under hedges in England and other parts of Europe. It grows best in a stiff loam. The seed is sown in April in drills from a foot to a foot and a half apart, and the plants are out in July of the second year, just after the fall of the blossom. A labourer, wearing thick gloves to protect his hands from the prickles, cuts the teasels with a sharp knife about nine inches below the head, after which they are tied in small bundles and dried in the sunshine. They are then sorted according to size into kings, middlings, and scrubs. The crooked awns or chaffs are fixed around the circumference of large broad wheels or cylinders, and the cloth is held against them. They raise a nap upon it which is afterwards cut level. A piece of fine broad cloth requires 1,500 to 2,000 of them to bring out the nap, after which the teasels are broken and useless. Steel substitutes for teasels have been tried, but ineffectually; they are not sufficiently pliant, and tear the fine fibres of the cloth.

1. Flower; 2. Fruit; 3. Stem and leaves; 4. A bract.

(2) The burr of the plant.
 2. Mech. & Cloth-manuf.: Any contrivance used as a substitute for teasels in the dressing of woolen cloth.

tēch'-i-nēss, s. [Eng. techy; -ness.] The quality or state of being techy; peevishness, fretfulness.

tēch'-nic, a. & s. [Fr. technique.]

A. As adj.: The same as TECHNICAL (q.v.).

B. As subst.: The method of performance or manipulation in any art; technical skill or manipulation; artistic execution.

tēch'-nic-al, a. & s. [Gr. τεχνικός (technikos) = belonging to the arts; τέχνη (technē) = art.]

A. As adj.: Of or pertaining to the mechanical arts, or to any particular art, science, profession, handicraft, business, or the like.

"All the dispute is made to turn upon logical niceties, or metaphysical subtleties about the nature of things seemingly mysterious, or rather upon the meaning of technical terms and names, such as individual, &c."
Waterland: Works, v. 346.

B. As subst. (Pl.): Those things which pertain to the practical part of an art or science; technicalities; technics.

technical-education, s. Specific instruction required by every person engaged in a particular occupation, in addition to the general education needed, more or less, by all the citizens of a state. Much attention has been paid in this country and in Europe to the subject of technical education, and considerable progress has been made in that direction, numerous technical schools having been instituted in the several large cities. The most prominent of these is the School of Mechanic Arts of the Institute of Technology, Boston. Among others are the Manual Training School of Washington University, St. Louis, the Spring Garden Institute, Philadelphia, the Williamson School of Mechanical Arts, and various others, while the Manual Training public schools are proving of the utmost educational value. Technical education has also made great progress in Europe, from whose schools came the incentive to American advance in this direction, the schools of this country having all been instituted since the European exhibit at the Centennial Exhibition of 1876. In France, Belgium, Holland, and Sweden manual training is a feature of the elementary schools, and schools for trade instruction exist in the other countries. Their introduction into Britain was late, but they are now well advanced in that country. Their purpose is to ensure to the artisan a thorough acquaintance with his business, by supplementing the practical experience of the workshop or factory with the scientific knowledge gained in the class-room under properly qualified teachers.

tēch'-nī-cāl'-i-ty, s. [Eng. technical; -ity.]
 1. Technicalness (q.v.).

2. Anything technical or peculiar to a particular science, art, profession, manufacture, or the like; a technical term or expression.

Daily Telegraph, Sept. 7, 1855.

tēch'-nī-cāl-ly, adv. [Eng. technical; -ly.] In a technical manner; according to technics or technicalities.

"But the first professed English satirist, to speak technically, is Bishop Joseph Hall, successively Bishop of Exeter and Norwich."
Warren: English Poetry, vol. iv.

tēch'-nī-cāl-nēss, s. [Eng. technical; -ness.] The quality or state of being technical or peculiar to a particular art, science, manufacture, &c.

* tēch'-nī-cist, s. [Eng. technic; -ist.] One skilled in technica or in the practical arts.

* tēch'-nī-cō-lōg'-ic-al, a. [Eng. technical, and Gr. λόγος (logos) = a word.] Technological; technical.

"Had the apostle used this technological phrase in any different sense from its common acceptance, he would have told us of it."
Scott: Christian Life, pt. II, ch. vii.

tēch'-nics, s. sing. & pl. [TECHNIC.]

1. Sing.: The doctrine of arts in general; such branches of learning as respect the arts.

"In the schools of the middle classes science rather than technics is needed, because, when the seeds of science are sown, technics as its fruit will appear at the appointed time."
Daily Telegraph, Sept. 10, 1855.

2. Pl.: Technical terms or objects; technicalities.

tēch'-nique, s. [Fr.] [TECHNIC.]

tég-én-ár'-y-a, s. [Formed from Lat. Tegea; Gr. Teyéa (Tegea) = a town in Arcadia.]

Zool.: The typical genus of Tegenariidæ (q.v.). It contains the House-spider, under which there appear to have been confounded two species: Tegenaria domestica and T. civilis, the former with proportionately longer legs than the latter. It is, besides, rather more than half an inch long, while the other one is rather less. They weave their webs in the corners of windows, of neglected rooms, or outhouses. They live about four years, and deposit their eggs in lenticular cocoons of white silk, and again in a silk bag disguised by plaster, &c.

tég-én-a-rí'-í-dæ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. tegenari(a); fem. pl. adj. suff. -idæ.]

Zool.: A family of Spiders, tribe Dipnemonites and its Sedentary Division. The ocelli are in two rows, the first pair of legs usually the longer; the web irregular. Sometimes there are three claws. It is a large family, in some classifications divided into the subfamilies Drassidæ, Dysderidæ, Scytotidæ, Ciniflonidæ, and Agelenidæ.

tég-mén (pi. tég-mín-a), s. [Lat. tegmen, tegmen, tegumen = a covering.] [TEGMENT.]

Botany:

- 1. Brongniart's name for the secundine of an ovule.
- 2. Mirbel's name for the inner coat of a seed.

té'-í-dæ, s. pl. [TEJDÆ.]

Té íg'-í-túr, phr. [Lat. = Tece, therefore.]

Eccles.: The first two words of the Canon of the Mass. The expression appears to have been also used to denote a book containing a portion of the Liturgy (McClintock & Strong), but it is not mentioned in the list of Liturgical Books given by Smith & Cheetham in Christian Antiquities.

téil, s. [Fr. teil, from Lat. tilia = a lime or linden-tree.] The lime-tree or linden.

teel-tree, s.

1. Bot.: The same as TEIL (q.v.)

2. Script.: The Heb. עֵלֶה (elah) is not the lime-tree, but is probably the Terbinth, as it is rendered in the R.V.

"A teel-tree and an oak have their substance in them when they cast their leaves."—Jesiah vi. 12.

* tein, s. [THANE.]

* tein-land, s. Thane-land.

teind, s. [Icel. tíund = a tenth, tithle, from hin = ten; Goth. taiumda = the tenth; Sw. tíenda.] The name given in Scotland to tithes. They originated at a remote period; and at the Reformation John Knox contended that after allotting some provision for the displaced Roman Catholic clergy, the remainder of the teinds should be used for the support of the Protestant ministers, for universities and schools, and for the poor. Through the opposition of the aristocracy, the arrangement was but partially carried out. At the union between England and Scotland, in 1707, the Lords of the Court of Session were appointed to be Commissioners of Teinds, and power was given them to determine "the transporting of kirks," as the population moved from one locality to another, the consent of three-fourths of the heritors in point of valuation being necessary to warrant the removal. In 1837 and 1838 there were laid before Parliament nine folio volumes of reports by a Commission appointed to inquire into church accommodation, &c., in Scotland. It reported that the parsonage teinds were held by the Crown, by universities, by pious foundations, by lay titulars (analogous to the lay proprietors in England), or by the proprietors of the lands from which they were due; they were in all cases eligible to pay the stipends held or which might be awarded by the Court of Teinds to the ministers, but that they could not be transferred from one parish to another.

"On Wednesday, we are to be heard in the great teind case in presence."—Scott: Guy Mannering, ch. xxxix.

¶ Court of Teinds, Commissioners of Teinds: A court in Scotland having jurisdiction over all matters respecting valuations and sales of teinds, augmentations of stipends, the junction or annexation of parishes, &c. Its powers are exercised by the judges of the Court of Session, as a Parliamentary Commission.

teind-master, s. One who is entitled to teinds. (Scotch.)

teine, s. [TEYNE.]

teín'-ó-scope, s. [Gr. teiwō (teindō) = to stretch, and σκόπεω (skopēō) = to see, to observe.] A name given by Sir David Brewster to an optical instrument, consisting of prisms so combined that the chromatic aberration of the light is corrected, and the linear dimensions of objects seen through them are increased or diminished. (Brande.)

fáte, fát, fáre, amidst, whát, fáll, father; wé, wét, hère, camél, hër, thère; pine, píe, síre, sír, marine; gó, pól, er, wóre, wól, wór, whó, sòn; müte, cüb, cüre, ünite, öür, rále, füll; trý, Sýrian. se, oe = ö; ey = ä; qu = kw.

teint, *teint, s. [Fr., prop. pa. par. of teindre (Lat. tingo) = to dye.] [TINT.] Colour, tinge, tint.

teint-ure, †teint-ure, s. [TINCTURE.] Colour, tint.

tē-lī-dae (j as y), tē-lī-dae, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. tē(x)us, tē(x)us; Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -idae.]

Zool.: A family of Lizards, sub-order Cionocrania, with ten genera, from tropical and sub-tropical America. Scales small, granular, sometimes with larger tubercles, those of the belly oblong, quadrangular, in cross bands; large symmetrical acutes on head; tongue long, scaly, and bifid at end; dentition acro-dont; no fold of skin along the sides.

tē-lūs (j as y), tē-lūs, s. [Latinised from native name.]

Zool.: The type-genus of Tejidæ, with three species, from Brazil and Mendoza. [TEGUEXIN.]

tē-lō-lē (pl. tē-lō-lē), s. [Lat. = any woven stuff; a web.]

- 1. Anat.: A web-like membrane.
2. Bot.: The elementary tissue.

tela-choroidea, s.

Anat.: The choroid web, the membrane which connects the choroid plexuses of the two sides of the cerebrum. Called also velum interpositum.

tela-oontexta, s.

Bot.: Parenchyma in which the cells are arranged in threads which cross each other irregularly. Found in Lichens, Fungi, and some Algae.

TELAMONES. (From the Telapirium at the Baths at Pompeii.)

tē-l-a-mōn (pl. tē-l-a-mō-nēs), s. [Gr. = bearer.]

Arch.: A male figure serving as a column or pilaster to support an entablature, in the same way as Caryatidea or Atlantes.

tē-lar-lŷ, adv. [Eng. telar(y); -ly.] In manner of a web. (Browne.)

tē-la-rŷ, α. [Lat. tela = a web.]
1. Of or pertaining to a web.
2. Spinning or forming webs.

tē-lās-pŷ-rine, s. [Etym. doubtful, but prob. a bad compound of Eng. tellurium and pyrites.]

Mtn.: A variety of iron pyrites, containing tellurium, occurring at Sunshine Camp, Colorado, which is probably the same as tellurpyrite (q.v.). Named by Shepard.

tē-lān-tō-grām, s. The record made by a teleautograph.

tē-lān-tō-grāph, s. A kind of telegraph in which a receiving pen reproduces at a distance the motions, and thereby the actual tracings, of the transmitting pen used by the sender of the writing, drawing, &c.

tē-lō-dū, s. [Native name.]

Zool.: Mydus meliceps, the Stinking Badger; the sole species of the genus; a small, nocturnal, burrowing mammal, found only in Java and Sumatra, and living at an elevation of 7,000 feet above the sea. It is about a foot long, with a pig-like head, stout body, very short legs, and a stumpy tail; colour, dark brown, with a white band running along the back. Like the skunk, it has the power of ejecting an intensely fetid liquid from its anal glands.

tē-lō-grām, s. [Gr. tēle (tēle) = afar off, suff. -gram. Formed from telegraph on the analogy of monogram, chronogram, logogram, &c. The word was first used in America in 1852, and was the subject of a long and learned discussion in the English newspapers previous to its adoption in Great Britain. Several eminent philologists proposed the term telegrapheme instead.] A telegraphic message or despatch; a communication sent by telegraph.

"There is, as against the exact but surfeiting telegrapheme, our lawless telegram, to which is strictly applicable the maxim of the civilians, as regards a clandestine marriage, 'Fieri not debuit, sed factum, valet.'"—Fitzedward Hall: Modern English, p. 184.

† To milk a telegram: Surprisingly to obtain and make use of a telegram intended for another. (Slang.)

tē-lō-grām-mic, α. [Eng. telegram; -ic.] Of or pertaining to a telegram; having the nature of a telegram; hence, brief, concise.

tē-lō-grāph, s. [Gr. tēle (tēle) = afar off, and γράφω (graphō) = to write.]

1. In a general sense, the word telegraph includes all modes of communicating intelligence to a distance. The modes may be classified as: visible (as semaphores), audible, or tangible.

"His friends established a telegraph by means of which they conveyed with him across the lines of sentinels."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xlii.

2. Specif.: [ELECTRIC TELEGRAPH.]

3. A message sent by telegraph; a telegram.

4. The same as TELEGRAPH-BOARD (q.v.).

5. A board used in signalling the number of runs made in a cricket match, the number of wickets down, and the runs made by the last batsman out.

telegraph-board, s. A board on which are hoisted or otherwise marked the numbers of horses about to run in a race, together with the names of their jockeys.

"When the race is all over we may look at the telegraph-board in vain to find her officially-printed number."—Daily Chronicle, Sept. 14, 1885.

telegraph-clock, s. An arrangement by which time is signalled to a number of different apartments in a building or to several buildings. This may be performed by electromagnetic devices, or by mechanical means.

telegraph-dial, s. A circle on which are arranged the letters of the alphabet, figures, &c., the hand or pointer being operated by electro-magnetic action.

telegraph-instrument, s. A moving mechanical device used in the electric circuit; a perforator, transmitter, receiver, relay, register, or what not. Among the chief instruments for the reception and transmission of messages are: the Sounder, in which the message is received by sound, the Wheatstone, the Bell, the A B C, and the Single-needle. Of these the Sounder or Morse system, is the most generally serviceable of hand-worked systems, and has been adopted by all countries but Britain, and there in all offices but those of the railways. In these the five-needle system, which was formerly used, has given place to the double and now to the single needle, with a great increase in effectiveness. In the signals of this instrument the Morse alphabet is used. In 1850 the average number of words transmitted per minute was sixteen. Now as many as five hundred words a minute can be sent, by the aid of the fast-speed repeaters. On the duplex, which are generally Morse Sounders, the average rate is about 60 messages per hour, though 80 are sometimes sent. By aid of multiplex telegraph six messages can now be sent in one direction and five in the opposite on a single wire, while by the aid of repeaters a message can be sent around the globe in twenty minutes. In dry climates the limit of communication without repeating is seldom reached in practice, but in a moist climate like that of England the limit may be fixed at 400 miles, induction and leakage rendering repeating necessary at this distance.

telegraph-key, s. The vibrating-piece in a transmitting-instrument, which is touched by the finger to establish an electric circuit.

telegraph-plant, s. Bot.: Desmodium gyrans.

telegraph-post, s. A post for keeping the wires elevated above the ground and out of contact with all surrounding objects, excepting the insulators on the posts.

telegraph-reel, s. A device on which the endless strip of paper is wound on a recording telegraph.

telegraph-register, s. A recording-device at the receiving end of a circuit.

telegraph-wire, s. The wire by which the electric current passes from one station to another, the metallic communication between stations, also connecting instruments, battery, and ground. Wire and instruments form the circuit. Wires are attached by binding-screws or terminals to telegraph instruments.

tē-lō-grāph, v. t. & i. [TELEGRAPH, s.]

A. Transitive:

1. To transmit, convey, or announce, as a message, speech, or intelligence, by means of a telegraph, and especially by the electric telegraph.

2. To signal in any way.

B. Intrans.: To send a message by telegraph.

tē-lō-grāph-ēr, s. One who transmits telegraphic messages, or is skilled in telegraphy.

tē-lō-grāph-ic, α. [Eng. telegraph, s.; -ic.]

1. Of or pertaining to a telegraph; made, sent, or communicated by a telegraph.

"The delay in the transmission of telegraphic news from Madrid."—Daily Chronicle, Sept. 7, 1885.

2. Of the nature of a telegraph; used for telegraphing.

"Forty new automatic telegraphic instruments, each capable of telegraphing three hundred words a minute."—Queen, Sept. 26, 1885.

telegraphic-keyboard, s. The bank of keys of a printing-telegraph machine.

*tē-lō-grāph-ic-al, α. [Eng. telegraphic; -al.] The same as TELEGRAPHIC (q.v.).

tē-lō-grāph-ic-al-lŷ, adv. [Eng. telegraphic; -ly.] In a telegraphic manner; by means of the telegraph.

"[He] has telegraphically instructed the Servian representatives abroad."—Evening Standard, Nov. 14, 1885.

tē-lō-grāph-ist, s. [Eng. telegraph; -ist.] One skilled in telegraphy; one who works a telegraph; a telegraphic operator.

"The good service rendered by them as telegraphists during the late campaign."—Daily Telegraph, Oct. 8, 1885.

tē-lō-grāph-ŷ, s. [Eng. telegraph; -y.] The art or practice of communicating intelligence by a telegraph; the science or art of constructing or managing telegraphs.

"The practical details of telegraphy have little interest for the majority of our members."—Proc. Phys. Soc., pt. II., p. 7.

tē-lō-cōn-ō-grāph, s. [Eng. tele(scope); Gr. tēkon (tēkon) = an image, and γράφω (graphō) = to draw, to write.]

Optics: A combination of the telescope and camera-lucida, invented by M. Revoil. The principle involved is that of allowing the image transmitted by the object-glass of a telescope to pass through a prism connected with the eye-piece. The rays of light that would in the ordinary use of the telescope be transmitted direct to the eye are refracted by the prism, and thrown down upon a table placed below the eye-piece. The distance between the prism and the table determines the size of the image projected on the latter, and it is easy for the observer to trace on a paper placed on this sketching-table the actual outline indicated by the refracted light.

tē-lō-dō-sau-rūs, s. [Gr. tēleios (tēleios) = perfect; eidos (eidos) = form, and sauros (sauros) = a lizard.]

Palæont.: A genus of Crocodiles, sub-order Mesosuchia. It is akin to Teleosaurus, and, like it, is from the Fuller's Earth. It is not, however, British.

*tē-lō-i-tŷ, s. [Gr. tēlos (tēlos) = end.] End, completion.

"The telelogy of the mixture."—Gentleman Instructed, p. 427.

*tē-lō-ō-grāph, *tē-lō-grāph, s. [TELEGRAPH.] A modification of the semaphore (q.v.), introduced about the close of the eighteenth century.

"Mr. R. Lovell Edgeworth about the same time brought before the public his plan of a telegraph, or as he called it telegraph or telegraph, by which the signals represented numbers, the meaning of which would be found in the dictionary prepared for the system."—Hilsey & Davis: Amer. Cyclop., sv. 606.

tē-lō-lōgic, s. [Gr. tēle (tēle) = afar off, and λόγος (logos) = a word.] A telegraphic message; a telegram.

"To try the experiment of penny telelogues or messages from one part of London to another."—Pall Mall Gazette, April 22, 1884.

bōil, bōy; pōut, jōwl; cat, çoll, chorus, çhin, bench; go, çem; thin, çhis; sin, aç; expect, çenophon, exist. ph = f. -cian, -tian = ahan. -tion, -sion = shün; -çion, -çion = shün. -cions, -çions, -sious = shüs. -ble, -die, &c. = bpl, dpl.

tē-lēm'-ē-tēr, s. [Gr. ἤλε (tēle) = afar off, and Eng. meter.] An instrument for determining the distance of an object whose linear dimensions are known, from its apparent length or height, when viewed between two parallel wires of a telescope.

tēl'-ē-mī'-crō-phōne, s. [Formed from tele-(phone) and microphone.]

Physics: An instrument described at the Académie des Sciences, Paris, Jan. 25, 1886, by M. E. Mercadier. (See extract.)

"By telemeterophony the author understands a combined apparatus simultaneously producing the effects of the microphone and the telephone, and reversing like the latter. He has constructed instruments of this kind, for which he claims the following advantages over the ordinary microphone: reduction of the number of organs on the microphone posts, and consequent diminution of the total resistance of the apparatus on the same line."—Nature.

tēl'-ē-mī'-crō-scope, s. A newly invented American microscope with telescopic adjustment, enabling objects to be seen much magnified at a distance of several feet.

tē-lēm'-ēi'-scope, s. [Gr. ἤλε (tēle) = afar off; ἔγγυς (engyus) = near, and σκοπεῖν (skopein) = to see.] An instrument combining the powers of the telescope and microscope.

tēl'-ē-ō-ē-dāc'-tyl-a, s. pl. [Gr. τέλεος (telēos) = perfect, and δάκτυλος (daktulos) = a finger.]

Palæont.: A division of Ungulata suggested by Nicholson (Palæont., ii. 319) for the Coryphodontidae, in which the feet are five-toed, at present placed with the Perissodactyles.

tēl'-ē-ō-lōg'-ic-al, a. [Eng. teleology(-); -ical.] Of or pertaining to teleology; relating to final causes.

"The facility of the teleological argument may be seen in this, that until we have discovered the law of succession, until the facts are coordinated, the assumption of a final cause brings with it no illumination, and when the law has been discovered, the addition of the final cause brings no increase of knowledge."—G. H. Lewes: Hist. Philos. (ed. 1880), i. 215, 216.

tēl'-ē-ō-lōg'-ic-al-lý, adv. [Eng. teleological(-); -ly.] In a teleological manner; according to the principles of teleology.

tēl'-ē-ō-l-ō-gíst, s. [Eng. teleology(-); -ist.] One versed in teleology; one who investigates the final cause or purpose of phenomena, or the end for which each has been produced.

tēl'-ē-ō-l-ō-gý, s. [Gr. τέλος, τέλος (telos, telēos) = the end, and λόγος (logos) = a discourse.]

Philosophy:

1. A branch of metaphysics; the doctrine of final causes and of the uses which every part of nature was designed to subserve; the argument from design in proof of the existence of God. The expression "final causes" was introduced by Aristotle, and the extension which he gave to the idea of causation drew his followers away from studying the proper object of physical science. Bacon (de Aug. Scient., bk. iii., ch. v.) said on the subject: "Causarum finalium inquisitio sterilis est, et, tanquam virgo Deo consecrata, nihil parit" (Inquiry into final causes is fruitless, and, like a virgin dedicated to God, produces nothing). The context shows that his objection was not to the investigation of final causes in themselves, but to the supposition that this study was a branch of physics. It was, he said, the "second part of metaphysics." His objection to its introduction into physics was not merely that it violated logical order, but that it operated as a powerful obstacle to the study of physical causes. Des Cartes objected to the study of final causes, believing that to do so successfully was beyond the faculties of man; and most of the French philosophers of the eighteenth century for various reasons ignored teleology. Modern physical science confines itself rigorously, as its name suggests, to the investigation of physical causes.

2. The doctrine of ends in morality, prudence or policy, and aesthetics.

"Every art is thus a joint result of the laws of nature disclosed by science, and of the general principle of what has been called Teleology, or the Doctrine of Ends, which, borrowing the language of the German metaphysicians, may also be termed, not improperly, the principles of Practical Reason."—Mill: Logic, bk. vi., ch. xii., § 6.

tēl'-ē-ō-phýte, s. [Gr. τέλεος (telēos), τέλειος (telēios) = complete, perfect, and φυτόν (phuton) = a plant.]

Biol.: A plant composed of a number of cells arranged in tissues.

"A tree is an assemblage of numerous united shoots. One of these great teleophytes is thus an aggregate of aggregates of units, which severally resemble prototypes in their sizes and structures."—H. Spencer: Prin. Biol. (ed. 1864), i. 109.

tēl'-ē-ō-sāur, s. [TELEOSAURUS.] A fossil saurian of the genus Teleosaurus.

"The Teleosaurs were preceded by Belodon."—Phil. Mag.: Geology (ed. 1865), i. 513.

tēl'-ē-ō-sāu-rī-a, s. pl. [TELEOSAURUS.]

Palæont.: A group of fossil Crocodiles, usually merged in the Mesosuchia of Huxley, or the Amphicoelia of Owen.

tēl'-ē-ō-sāu-rī-an, s. [TELEOSAURIA.] Any individual of the Teleosauria (q.v.).

"Has large premaxillary vacuities like a Teleosaurian."—Quart. Journ. Geol. Soc., xxxi. 481.

tēl'-ē-ō-sāu-rūs, s. [Gr. τέλειος (telēios) = perfect, and σαῦρος (sauros) = a lizard.]

Palæont.: A genus of Mesosuchia. The jaws are very elongated, and have many conical teeth like those of the modern Gavials. The dermal scales are large, strong, and solid. From the Fuller's Earth. Species numerous.

tēl'-ē-ōst, s. [TELEOSTEI.] A teleostean.

tēl'-ē-ōs'-tē-an, s. & a. [TELEOSTEI.]

A. As substantive:

Zool.: Any member of the order TELEOSTEI (q.v.).

B. As adj.:

Of or pertaining to the Teleostei.

tēl'-ē-ōs'-tē-i, s. pl. [Gr. τέλειος (telēos), τέλειος (telēios) = perfect, and ὀστέον (osteon) = a bone.]

1. Ichthy.: In modern classifications a subclass including the majority of the existing species. They correspond broadly with the Osseous Fishes of Cuvier, and the Ctenoidei and Cycloidei of Agassiz. Heart with a non-contractile arterial bulb; intestine without spiral valve; optic nerve decussating; skeleton well ossified, with biconcave vertebrae; tail homocercal (though in early stages of its development it has a heterocercal form). They are usually protected by thin, lubricating ctenoid or cycloid scales, sometimes by bony plates, whilst in some the skin is naked. The gills are free, with one external opening protected by a gill-cover. As arranged by Dr. Günther, the Teleostei are divided into six orders: (1) Acanthopterygii (sub-divided into Perciformes, Beryciformes, Kurtiformes, Polyneiformes, Sciæniiformes, Xiphiiformes, Trichuriformes, Cotto-Scobriformes, Gobii-formes, Blenniiformes, Mugiliformes, Gastrosteiformes, Centrisciformes, Gobiiesociformes, Channiformes, Labyrinthibranchii, Lophotiformes, Tæniiformes, and Notacanthiformes); (2) Acanthopterygii Pharyngognathi; (3) Anacanthini (sub-divided into Gadoidei and Pleuronectoides); (4) Physostomi; (5) Lophobranchii; and (6) Plectognathi. In Müller's classification, the Teleostei were also made a sub-class with six orders: (1) Acanthopteri; (2) Anacanthini (Sub-brachii, Apodes); (3) Pharyngognathi (Acanthopterygii, Malacopterygii); (4) Physostomi (Abdominales, Apodes); (5) Plectognathi; and (6) Lophobranchii.

2. Palæont.: The Teleostei appear first in the Chalk, but the majority of the fossil genera are of Tertiary age.

tēl'-ē-ō-zō-ōn (pl. tēl'-ē-ō-zō-a), s. [Gr. τέλειος (telēos), τέλειος (telēios) = complete, perfect, and ζῷον (zōon) = an animal.]

Biol.: An animal composed of a number of cells arranged in tissues.

"It is among the Protzoa that there occur numerous cases of vital activity displayed by specks of protoplasm; and from the minute anatomy of all creatures above these up to the Teleostea, are drawn the numerous proofs that cellular tissues may arise by direct metamorphosis of structureless colloidal substance."—H. Spencer: Prin. Biol. (ed. 1864), ii. 77.

tē-lēp'-a-thý, s. [Gr. ἤλε (tēle) = afar off, and πάθος (patheos) = in sympathy with, but suffering.] The feeling or experiencing of sensations at a distance from another person.

"Telepathy occurs, it appears, when the mind of one human being affects the mind of another human being, but not through any of the recognized channels of sense. If the mind of the reader of this article could cause the mind of the Sultan of Turkey to be violently and automatically impressed with a vision of the 'Daily News' of yesterday, that would be telepathy."—Daily News, Nov. 6, 1886.

tēl'-ē-phōne, s. Gr. ἤλε (tēle) = afar off, and φωνή (phōnē) = a sound; voice.]

Physics: An instrument for transmitting sounds or speech to distances where such would be inaudible through serial sound-waves. This definition excludes speaking tubes, which act simply by preserving and concentrating sound-waves. Telephonic action depends upon the fact that sound-waves in air are capable of communicating vibrations to a stretched membrane, and if by any means such vibrations can be transmitted with true resemblance to another membrane at any distance, such receiving membrane will reproduce the sound. This capacity of a simple vibrating membrane to reproduce the most complicated sounds, as of speech, is in reality the greatest mystery connected with the matter; all else relates to the mechanism of transmission only. The essential nature of the operation is well shown in the common toy telephone sold in the streets, in which the floors of two small tin cups consist of stretched membranes, or even of paper. The two membranes are connected by a long piece of twine. If now one cup be held to the mouth and spoken into, the voice communicates vibrations to the membrane. The stretched twine communicates similar vibrations to the membrane of the other cup, and if its cavity be held to the ear the sounds will be heard. This is a true mechanical telephone. The term is more commonly applied to the electrical telephonic apparatus so much used in modern life, but the principle is precisely similar. Such apparatus generally belongs to one of two main classes. The true inventor of the first was undoubtedly Philip Reis, who showed, in 1861, that variations in an electric current caused by a vibrating membrane could reproduce the necessary vibrations. Reis in this way transmitted musical sounds and even words; but his apparatus was imperfect, and it was reserved for Mr. Graham Bell to perfect that which is still commonly used and known as the Bell telephone, though it is the nearly unanimous opinion of electricians that Bell's patent has been held by courts of law to cover far more ground than is really due to him, much to the public detriment and to the hindrance of progress. Bell's telephone and its action may be understood on reference to the diagram, where d is a cylindrical steel magnet, surrounded at one end by a coil of wire, a, whose ends are connected by the wires ee where the circuit, or line-wire. It will now be understood [MAGNETISM] that any change in the power of the magnet will cause currents in this wire. Near, but not touching, the magnet's end is stretched a very thin sheet of iron, b, as a membrane, which is spoken to through the mouthpiece c. This made to vibrate, the iron membrane approaches and recedes from the magnet; and as it acts towards this as an armature, tending to close the magnetic circuit, the effect is to produce fluctuating degrees of free magnetism, which again produce fluctuating or undulating currents in the line-wire. But if these fluctuating currents are received in a precisely similar instrument, they in its coil produce variable magnetic force in the magnet, and this reproduces vibrations in the second iron membrane, which reproduce the sound. The second class of instruments are based upon the Microphone (q.v.). If part of a galvanic current is composed of two or three pieces of matter (preferably charcoal) in loose contact, variations in the current produce variations in the contact pressure of the loose pieces, and the converse. Hence, instead of a vibrating membrane causing undulating currents by means of a magnet as in the Bell method, it may abut against such a series of mere contacts, and thus cause an undulating or variable current which again is capable of the converse action. A microphone is thus capable, with more or less modification, of being used as a telephone, and the employment of either method is a question of practical conditions. The Bell telephone is independent of any battery, being self-acting; but its feeble currents are incapable of transmitting speech to a distance; hence most of the modifications in magnetic telephones have had the design of increasing the power, as by using both poles of the magnet, and in other ways. The microphone, on the other hand, uses the power of a battery in its circuit, but in some respects appears less delicately sensitive than the free membrane. There are various forms of telephone in use, employing different sources of electric power, and the instrument has been made available at distances of a thousand miles or more.

telephone-booth, s. A small closet in which, for privacy, a telephone is frequently located.

telephone-line, s. A line of wire forming the medium of an electric circuit whereby telephone communication is established between two or more points.

tēl-ē-phōne, v.t. & t. [TELEPHONE, s.]

A. Trans.: To send, communicate, transmit, or reproduce as sounds, a message, or the like, by means of a telephone.

B. Intrans.: To send, transmit, or reproduce sounds, a message, or the like, by means of a telephone.

tēl-ē-phōn'-īc, a. [Eng. telephon(e); a.; -ic.] Of or pertaining to the telephone; communicated, transmitted, or reproduced by means of the telephone.

tē-lēph'-ōn-ist, s. [Eng. telephon(e); -ist.] A person versed in the telephone; one who operates a telephone.

tēl ē-phōn'ō-graph, s. A receiving instrument for recording a telephonic message.

tē-lēph'-ō-nŷ, s. [Eng. telephon(e); -y.] The art or practice of transmitting or reproducing sounds, communications, &c., by means of the telephone.

† tēl-ē-phōr'-ī-dæ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. telephor(us); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -idæ.]

Entom.: A family of Beetles, now reduced to the sub-family Telephorinae (q.v.).

tēl-ē-phō-rī'-næ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. telephor(us); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -inæ.]

Entom.: A sub-family of Lampyridæ, more elongated and narrower than the typical Lampyridæ. The legs are also longer; the head is not covered by the prothorax. World-wide in distribution. One genus, which connects the Telephorinae with the Lampyridæ, is luminous.

tēl-ē-phōr'-ī-ŭm, s. [Mod. Lat. telephorus (q.v.).]

Palæont.: A genus of Coleoptera akin to Telephorus (q.v.), from the Furbeck beds.

tē-lēph'-ōr-ŭs, s. [Gr. τελεος (telos) = end, and φορός (phoros) = bearing.]

Entom.: The typical genus of Telephorinae (q.v.). They are known to children, from their colours, as Soldiers and Sailors. They are seen in meadows on plants, but are carnivorous. According to De Geer, the female sometimes devours the male. Twenty-four species are British.

tēl-ēr'-pē-tōn, s. [Gr. τίλα (tīle) = far off, and ἄπειρον (aperiton) = a reptile, a creeping thing; ἔρπω (herpō) = to creep.]

Palæont.: A genus of Lacertilia, founded by Mantell on remains of a reptile which he called Telepeton elginense, discovered in 1851 by Mr. Patrick Duff in Spynie, near Elgin, to light-coloured sandstone, once referred by some geologists to the Upper Devonian, but now held to be Triassic. The dentition seems to have acrodont, and it differed from most existing lizards merely in having amphicealous vertebrae. (Quar. Jour. Geol. Soc., viii, 100.)

tēl-ē-rŷth'-rīn, s. [Lat. tel(us) = the earth, and Eng. erythrinus.]

Chem.: A product of the decomposition of orsellinic ether when the ether, dissolved in hot water, is exposed to the air for several months. (Watts.)

tēl-ē-scope, s. [Gr. τίλα (tīle) = far off; σκοπέω (skopēō) = to see, to observe.]

Optical Instruments: An instrument for magnifying distant objects so as to make them look nearer the eye than they actually are. Its essential parts are: an object glass or a concave mirror to render the rays of light convergent, and form an image of the object, and an eyepiece to magnify it after the manner of a microscope. About A.D. 1000, Gerbert of Auvergne viewed the stars through a tube in which, however, there were no lenses. Roger Bacon seems to have known that lenses in combination had a magnifying power. Dr. Dee, in 1570, speaks of "perspective glasses," apparently used in war to survey the enemy's forces. Jansen and Lippersheim, Lippershey, or Laprey, spectacle-makers at Middelburg, and Jacob Adriaensz or Metius, seem to have first become aware of the power of instruments constructed like the modern telescope, and, on Oct. 2, 1608, Lippershey offered to the States-General three instruments "with which one can see to a distance." Galileo, hearing of this, divined how the result was effected, and constructed the Galilean telescope which had a double concave eyepiece, and made many astronomical discoveries with it, including the satellites of Jupiter. His telescope is still well known in the familiar opera-glass. Kepler first pointed out the advantage of making telescopes with two convex lenses, and Scheiner carried the suggestion into practice in 1650. De Rheita made a telescope with three lenses, and another of the binocular type. Huyghens made a telescope of 123 feet focal length, only the object glass of which was in a short tube, and his was not the largest one existing. The unwieldy character of these huge instruments led to the discovery of the reflecting telescope, of which four types arose. The Gregorian telescope was invented by James Gregory in 1663, the Cassegrainian telescope by Cassegrain in 1672, the Newtonian telescope by Sir Isaac Newton in 1669, and the Herschelian telescope by Sir William Herschel about 1779. Telescopes, it will be seen, are of two leading kinds—Refracting and Reflecting telescopes: in the former the image is formed by refraction through an object glass, in the latter by means of a concave mirror or speculum. A refracting telescope in the simplest form consists of a double convex lens (the object glass), and a second and smaller lens, also doubly convex (called the eye-piece). To render a telescope achromatic, the object glass is made double or triple, and the eye-piece is generally composed of two lenses adapted to each other. Not only does a telescope magnify objects, but it collects and concentrates upon the eye a greater amount of light than would enter the organ if unassisted, and the larger the object glass the greater in both respects is the power of the telescope; and a friendly rivalry exists between civilized nations as to which shall possess the most powerful telescope. The size of the object glass in refracting telescopes has steadily increased within recent years, mainly as a result of the skill of Mr. Alvan Clark, of Cambridgeport, Mass. It is not many years since his lens of 30 inches diameter, made for the Russian astronomers, was considered the finality of accomplishment; but since then he has made a 36-inch glass, now in the Liek observatory telescope at Mount Hamilton, Cal., and is engaged on a 40-inch lens designed for the Yerkes telescope, to be placed in an observatory at Lake Geneva, Wis., seventy-five miles north of Chicago. Lord Rosse's great reflecting telescope has a reflector of six feet in diameter, and can magnify an object 407 times without rendering it less bright than it appears to the naked eye. A refracting, astronomical telescope, having the eye-piece of a single lens, or of a pair of lenses, does not reverse the image formed by the object-glass, and therefore exhibits objects inverted, which does not much matter in astronomical observation. A terrestrial telescope, for looking at objects on the earth, has an eye-piece with two more lenses than an astronomical one; it therefore inverts the image and exhibits objects erect. [ACNAOMATIC TELESCOPE.]

tri-lobate, and the eyes, which are large and protruding, are set in pedicels.

telescope-fly, s.

Entom.: The dipterous genus Diopsis (q.v.).

telescope-shell, s.

Zool.: Cerithium telescopium. [CERITHIADÆ.]

tēl-ē-scope, v.t. & t. [TELESCOPE.]

A. Trans.: To drive or force the parts of into each other, like the sliding joints of a pocket telescope; said chiefly of railway carriages or other vehicles which come into collision. (Colloq.)

"Several of the wagons were telescoped, and much damage was done to the rolling stock."—Daily Telegraph, Jan. 10, 1886.

B. Intrans.: To move in the same manner as the movable joints or aliea of a pocket telescope; specifically, to run or be driven together, so that the one partially enters or is forced into the other; as, The carriages telescoped.

tēl-ē-scop'-īc, tēl-ē-scop'-īc-al, a. [Eng. telescopic(e); īc; īal.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Of or pertaining to a telescope; performed by the aid of a telescope; as, telescopic observations.

2. Seen or discoverable only by the help of a telescope.

"There are microscopical corpuscles in bodies, as there are telescopic stars in the heavens, neither of which can be discovered without the help of one or the other of these glasses."—Bolingbroke: Essay 1.

3. Seeing to a great distance; far-seeing; far-reaching.

"Turn outward now, and Fancy shall apply To your weak sight her telescopic eye."

Cowper: Truth, 98.

4. Having the power of extension by means of joints sliding one within the other, like the tube of a pocket telescope.

II. Mech.: Constructed or composed of concentric tubes. (See compounds.)

telescopic-boiler, s.

Steam: A boiler formed of several concentric cylindrical portions.

telescopic-chimney, s.

Naut.: A chimney which is in sections slipping into each other, to be lowered in time of action, or, in certain river-steamers, in passing beneath bridges.

telescopic-jack, s. A screw-jack, in which the lifting head is raised by the action of two screws having reversed threads, one working within the other, and both sinking or telescoping within the base. By this differential arrangement greater power is obtained.

telescopic-lens, s. A compound lens suited for the eye or object-glass of a telescope. Terrestrial telescopes, or spy-glasses, have two lenses more than astronomical telescopes, enabling an object to be seen in its natural instead of an inverted position.

tēl-ē-scop'-īc-al-ly, adv. [Eng. telescopic(al); -ly.]

1. By means of a telescope.

2. In manner of a telescope.

"As many as four wagons nearly telescopically stove in were heaped on top of each other."—Daily Telegraph, Jan. 10, 1886.

tēl-ē-scop'-ī-form, a. [Eng. telescope, and form.] Having the form or construction of a telescope.

tē-lēs'-cō-pist, s. [Eng. telescope; -ist.]

One skilled in the use of the telescope for astronomical purposes.

tēl-ē-sco'-pī-ŭm, s. [Mod. Lat. = a telescope.]

Astron.: A southern constellation, established by Lacaille. It is surrounded by Ara, Pavo, Sagittarius, and Ophiuchus. Its largest star is only of the fourth magnitude.

 Telescopium Herschell, s.

Astron.: Herschel's Telescope; a constellation named after Sir Wm. Herschel. It is in the Northern Hemisphere between Gemini, Lynx, and Auriga. It is not now generally admitted.

tē-lēs'-cō-pŷ, s. [Eng. telescope; -y.] The art or science of constructing or using the telescope.

telescope-carp, s. [TELESCOPE-FISH.]

telescope-fish, telescope-carp, s.

Ichthy.: The most highly-prized of the many varieties of Cyprinus (Carassius) auratus, the gold-fish. The dorsal fin is absent, the tail is much enlarged, sub-triangular or boi, bōy; pōūt, jōwī; cat, çell, cnorus, çhin, bench; go, gem; thin, this; sin, as; expect, Xenophon, exist. -īng. -cian, -tian = shan. -tion, -sion = shün: -tion, -sion = zhün. -cious, -tious, -sious = shüs. -hle, -dle, &c. = bəl, dəl.

tél-ē-sī-g, s. [Gr. τελεσιος (telesios) = finishing, completing; Fr. télésie.] Mtn.: A name given by Hatty to the pure varieties of sapphire (q.v.).

* tél-ē-gm, s. [Gr. τελεσμα (telesma) = an incantation.] A kind of amulet or magical charm; a talisman (q.v.).

* tél-ē-g-mát-ic, * tél-ē-g-mát-ic-al, a. [Gr. τελεσμα (telesma), genit. τελεσματος (telesmatos) = an incantation.] Of or pertaining to telesma or talismans; talismanic.

* tél-ē-g-mát-ic-al-ly, adv. [Eng. tele-matic; -ly.] By means of telesma or talismans.

"The part of Fortune found out, was mysteriously included in statue of brass, tele-matically prepared."
—Gregory: Notes on Scriptures, p. 92.

tél-ē-spēc-trō-scōpe, s. [Eng. tele(scope), and spectroscope.]

Optics: An instrument for observing the light from the planets and fixed stars, for ascertaining their physical condition and the composition of their atmospheres. It consists of a spectroscopa placed at the end of a telescope, and containing two prisms, while the image of the star is brought to the slit of the spectroscopa, which is one three-hundredth part of an inch in breadth.

tél-ē-stēr-ō-ō-scōpe, s. [Gr. τηλε (tele), = afar off, and Eng. steroscopia (q.v.).] An instrument described by Helmholtz, in 1857, for producing an appearance of relief in the objects of a landscape at moderate distances. It consists of a frame on which are set at a convenient distance—say 4½ feet—apart two plane mirrors at an angle of 45°, which receive the rays of light from the objects; these are reflected to two central mirrors, forming an angle of 45° with the first, in which they are viewed by the eye. The effect produced is the same as if the eyes of the observer were at the same distance apart as the two larger mirrors. When objects at a great distance are viewed, they do not appear in strong relief, but rather as if detached from the general landscape.

* tél-ēs-tio, * tél-ēs-tick, a. [Gr. τέλος (telos) = the end.] Pertaining to the final end or purpose; tending or serving to the end or finish.

* tél-ēs-tich, s. [Gr. τέλος (telos) = the end, and στιχος (stichos) = a row, a verse.] A poem, in which the final letters of each line make up a name.

tél-ē-thū-sa, s. [Lat. = the mother of Iphigeneia (Ovid: Met., ix. 652).] Zool.: A synonymy of Arenicola (q.v.).

tél-ē-thū-sī-dæ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. telethusa(q); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -idæ.] Zool.: An approximate synonym of Arenicola (q.v.).

tél-fair-ī-a, s. [Named after Mr. Telfair, superintendent of the Royal garden at Mauritius.]
Bot.: A genus of Nandirobeæ. Known species two, Telfairia pedata (JOLIFFIA), a wood-climber, with a stem from fifty to a hundred feet long, growing in Zanzibar; and T. occidentalis, from Western Africa, where it is cultivated for the seeds, which are eaten. When expressed they yield a bland oil.

* tél-förd, s. Originally Telford pavement; a pavement invented by Thomas Telford (1757-1834), a Scotch engineer, and consisting of large broken stones, packed with smaller ones, the whole covered with a fine layer rolled hard and smooth.

tél-förd-ize, v. To make (a road) according to Telford's method. [See Telford, s.]

tél-ic, a. [Gr. τέλος (telos) = the end.] Denoting the final end or purpose. [ECRATIC.]

Té-lin-ga, s. [See def. of compound.]
Telinga-potato, s.
Bot.: Amarophyllus campanulatus, cultivated in the Telinga or Telugu country for its edible roots or tubers.

tél-li-ni, s. [Native name (?).] (See etym. and compound.)

telini-fly, s.

Entom.: Mylabris cichorii, plentiful in most parts of India. It has been strongly recommended as a substitute for cantharides.

téll, * telle, * tell-en (pa. t. * tellde, * tolde, told, * tolde, ps. par. told), v. t. & i. [A.S. tellan (pa. t. tealde, ps. par. teald) = to count, to narrate, from talu = a tale, a number; cogn. with Dut. tellen, from tal = a tale; Icel. telja, from tala; Dan. talle, from tal; Sw. tälja, from tal; Ger. zahlen, from zahl.] [TALÉ.]

A. Transitive:

1. To count, to enumerate, to reckon.
"And some grow rich by telling lies,
And some by telling money."
Fraud: Chant of the Brazen Head.
2. To express in words; to communicate, to utter, to say.
"I will not eat until I have told my errand."—Genesis xxiv. 33.
3. To narrate, to relate, to rehearse.
"I'll tell you my dream."—Shakesp.: Merry Wives III. 2.
4. To make known by words; to divulge, to disclose, to confess, to acknowledge.
"Tell it not in Gath."—2 Samuel I. 20.
5. To explain, to solve.
"Whoso asked her for his wife,
His riddle told not, lost his life."
Shakesp.: Pericles, Prolog. 28.

6. With a personal object:

- (1) To give information or instruction to.
"I told him of myself."
Shakesp.: Antony & Cleopatra, II. 2.
- (2) To order, to direct; to give orders or directions to as, He told you to stay here.
7. To discern so as to be able to say or declare; to distinguish, to decide, to determine, to answer, to indicate; as, I cannot tell one from the other.

* 8. To publish, to proclaim, to declare.
"And there seiden, he semeth to be a teller of newe feendis, for he teilde to hem Jhesu and the agburryog."—Wycliffe: Devisis xviii.

B. Intransitive:

1. To give an account; to make or give a report; to speak.
"That I may . . . tell of all thy wondrous works."—Psalm xvi. 7.
2. To play the informer; to tell tales; to inform, to blab: as, If he docs so, I'll tell. (Colloq.)
3. To take effect; to produce a marked effect: as, Every shot told.
- * 1. I can tell you: Trust me; I can assure you. (Colloq.)
"They are burrs, I own tell you."—Shakesp.: Troilus & Cressida, III. 2.
2. To tell off:
- (1) To declare, to proclaim, to speak of, to mention.
- (2) To inform on or against; to tell talea of. (Colloq.)
3. To tell off: To count off; to select or detach for some special duty.
"Were told off to preserve a way clear of obstacles for the competitors."—Daily Telegraph, July 8, 1888.
4. To tell on: To inform against; to tell off. (Colloq.)
"David saved neither man nor woman alive, to bring tidings to Gath, saying, Lest they should tell on us."—1 Samuel xxviii. 17.
5. To tell one's beads: [BEAD].
6. To tell up: To count up; to tell; to amount or increase so as to produce a certain effect.

* tél-l, s. [TELL, v.] That which is told; a tale.
"I am at the end of my tell."—Walpole: To Mann, 1. 265.

* tell-clock, s. An idler.
"Is there no mean between busy-bodies and tell-clocks?"—Ward: Sermons, p. 131.

* tél-la-ble, a. [Eng. tell; -able.] Capable of being told.

tél-lén, s. [TELLINA.] Any individual of the family Tellinida. (See extract.)
The Tellens are found in all seas, chiefly in the littoral and limnic zones; they frequent sandy bottoms or sandy mud, burying beneath the surface; a few species inhabit estuaries and rivers. Their valves are often richly coloured and ornamented with finely sculptured lines.—Woodward: Mollusca (ed. Tate), p. 486.

tél-ér, s. [Eng. tell, v.; -er.]
1. One who tells, narrates, or communi-cates the knowledge of something; an informer.

"The nature of bad news infects the teller."
Shakesp.: Antony & Cleopatra, I. 2.

2. One who numbers or counts; one who tells or counts votes; specif., one of two members of the House of Representatives appointed, one on each side, by the Speaker to count or tell the votes in a division for and against a motion. In the House of Commons one for the ayes and one for the noes are associated to check each other in the telling.

* 3. An officer of the exchequer, formerly also called a tallier. [TALLV.] They were four in number; their business was to receive all moneys due to the king, and give the clerk of the pell a bill to charge him therewith; they also paid all persons any money payable to them by the king, by warrant from the auditor of the receipt; and also made books of receipts and payments which they delivered to the lord treasurer. The office was abolished by 4 & 5 Will. IV., c. 15, and their duties are now performed by a comptroller-general of the receipt and issue of the exchequer.

4. An officer in a bank, whose duty is to receive and pay money over the counter.

tél-ér-ship, s. [Eng. teller; -ship.] The office or employment of a teller.

tél-li-a, s. [Prob. from Lat. tellus = the earth. (See def.)]

Ichthy.: A pseudo-genus of Cyprinodontidæ, erected for the reception of such species of the type-genus Cyprinodon as have lost their ventral fins, either from living in limited localities or from their habit of concealing themselves in the mud. (Günther: Study of Fishes, p. 615.)

tél-li-na, s. [Gr. τελλινη (tellinē) = a kind of shell fish.]

Zool. & Palæont.: The type-genus of Tellinidæ (q.v.). Shell ovate, oblong, rounded in front, angular behind; valves smooth or marked with radiating stria. The animals have the power of leaping from the bottom by means of their muscular foot. The genus is cosmopolitan, most abundant in the tropics; more than 300 species have been described. Fossil species 170, from the Oolite onward.

* Tellina bathica erug or clay.
Geol.: A clay at the upper part of the Norwich Crag, characterised by the abundance of Tellina bathica. According to some authorities, it forms the base of the whole glacial series, and indicates the setting-in of the great glacial subsidence.

tél-l-ing, * tél-ying, pr. par., a., & s. [TELL, v.]

- A. As pr. par.: (See the verb).
- B. As adj.: Operating with great effect; highly effective.
"Its authors . . . are stronger in the invention of telling situations."—Observer, July 27, 1885.
- C. As subst.: The act of declaring, speaking, or uttering; in the plural, the act of declaring or divulging what ought not to be told; disclosure of a secret or what has been communicated in confidence.
"That's tellings: That would be giving information which ought not to be given; that is asking one to blab. (Colloq.)

tél-li-ni-dæ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. tellin(a); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -idæ.] Zool. & Palæont.: A family of Sinu-pallialia, with eleven species (Woodward), to which Tate adds three others. Shell equivale, closed, and compressed; cardinal teeth two; siphons separate, long, and slender, siphonal fold large; foot tongue-shaped. (See extract under TELLIN.) The family appears first in the Coal-measures.

tél-lin-ite, s. [Mod. Lat. tellin(a); suff. -ite.] A fossil Tellina (q.v.).

tél-ló-graph, s. [TELEOGRAPH.]

tél-l-tale, a. & s. [Eng. tell, v., and tale.]
A. As adj.: Telling tales; given to blabbing or telling tales; giving mischievous information. (Lit. & fig.)
"Make me not object to the tell-tale day."
Shakesp.: Rape of Lucrece, 604.

B. As substantive:
I. Ordinary Language:
1. One who tells tales; one who officiously fâte, fát, fáre, amidst, whát, fáll, father; wê, wêt, hère, camel, hër, thère; pine, pít, sire, sír, marine; gô, pôť, or, wôre, wôlf, wôrk, whó, sôn; müte, oib, oure, unite, our, rüle, füll; trý, Sýrian. æ, œ = è; ey = ä; qu = kw.

divulges the private affairs of others; one who tells what prudence should suppress; a tale-bearer.

"You speak to Cæsar; and to such a man That is no fearing tell-tale."

Shakesp.: Julius Cæsar, I, 2.

2. That which serves to interpret or manifest.

"Paint those eyes, so blue, so kind; Eager tell-tales of her mind."

Matthew Arnold: Switzerland.

II. Technically:

1. Mech.: A name given to a variety of devices, usually automatic, for counting, verifying, detecting, or indicating: as,

(1) A turnstile having mechanism which indicates the number of persons passing through it.

(2) A clock attachment for the purpose of causing a record to be made of the presence of a watchman at certain intervals. A common form is provided with a rotating paper dial, showing the hour and minutes at which the watchman touched a projecting stud which punctures the paper dial.

(3) A device attached to a station-meter to point out any irregularity in the production of gas.

2. Music: A movable piece attached to an organ to indicate when the wind is nearly exhausted.

3. Nautical:

(1) The same as TELL-TALE COMPASS (q.v.).

(2) An index in front of the wheel, or in the cabin, to show the position of the tiller.

4. Ornith.: An American name for Totanus flavipes and T. vociferus. So named because their shrill whistle alarms ducks.

telltale-compass, s.

Naut.: A compass suspended overhead in the cabin, with the face of the card downward, so that it is visible from below, and enables the captain to detect any error or irregularity in steering.

* tell-troth, s. [Eng. tell, s., and troth.] One who speaks the truth.

těl-lür'-al, s. [Lat. tellus, genit. telluris = the earth.] Of or pertaining to the earth.

těl-lür'-rate, s. [Eng. telluric; -ate.] Chem.: A salt of telluric acid.

těl-lür'-ē-thyl, s. [Eng. tellurium, and ethyl.]

Chem.: $\text{Te}(\text{C}_2\text{H}_5)_2$. Ethyl telluride; telluric ethide. A heavy, oily, yellowish-red liquid, obtained by distilling potassium telluride with potassium ethyl sulphate. It is very inflammable, has a disagreeable odour, and acts as a bivalent radical, uniting with chlorine, bromine, &c., to form compounds.

těl-lür'-röt'-téd, s. [Formed from Eng. tellurium (q.v.).] Combined with tellurium.

telluretted-hydrogen, s. [TELLURHYDROIC-ACID.]

těl-lür'-hÿ'-drate, s. [Eng. tellurium, and hydrate.] [TELLURIDE.]

těl-lür'-hÿ'-dric, s. [Eng. tellurium, and hydric.] Containing tellurium and hydrogen.

tellurhydric-acid, s. [HYDROGEN-TELLURIDE.]

těl-lür'-i-an, s. & n. [TELLURIUM.]

A. As substantive:

1. The same as TELLURIUM (q.v.).

2. An inhabitant of the earth; a mortal.

"So far ahead of us Tellurians in optical resources."—De Quincy: Joan of Arc.

B. As adj.: Of or pertaining to the earth.

"Hear the tellurian lungs wheezing."—De Quincy: System of the Heavens.

těl-lür'-ic (1), a. [Lat. tellus, genit. telluris = the earth.] Pertaining to, or proceeding from the earth.

"As regards its breadth the telluric movement went from the Levantine Aïve in the north to the Gulfs of Genoa and Lyons."—Daily Telegraph, March 1, 1887.

těl-lür'-ic (2), s. [Eng. tellurium; -ic.] Derived from or containing tellurium.

telluric-acid, s.

Chem.: H_2TeO_4 . A crystalline body obtained by fusing equal parts of tellurous oxide and sodium carbonate, dissolving the product in water precipitating by means of barium chloride, and decomposing with sulphuric acid. It has a metallic taste, reddens litmus-paper, and is freely, although slowly, soluble in water. The tellurates of the alkali-metals are soluble in water, the others are insoluble.

telluric-bismuth, s.

Min.: A name given to tetradymite, jositte, and wehrlite. (See these words.)

telluric-ethide, s. [TELLURETHYL.]

telluric-ochre, s. [TELLURITE.]

telluric-oxide, s.

Chem.: TeO_2 . Obtained by strongly heating crystallized telluric acid. It is insoluble in water, and even in a boiling alkaline liquid.

telluric-silver, s. [HESSITE, PETZITE.]

těl-lür'-ride, s. [Eng. tellurium; -ids.]

Chem.: A salt of tellurhydric acid.

† Telluride of bismuth = Tetradymite, Jositte, and Wehrlite; Telluride of lead = Allaite; Telluride of silver and gold = Petzite; Telluride of silver and lead = Sylvanite; Telluride of nickel = Melonite.

těl-lür'-i-ön, * těl-lür'-i-üm, s. [Lat. tellus, genit. telluris = the earth.] An apparatus for the purpose of illustrating to the eye the real and apparent movements of the earth; exhibiting the ellipticity of the earth's orbit; the position of the sun, represented by a lamp in one of the foci of that ellipse; the inclination of the pole to the plane of the ecliptic, and the constancy of the pole during the entire yearly revolution; the apparent movement through the constellations of the zodiac; the phenomena of eclipses, day and night, sunrise and sunset, and the seasons; the varying declination of the sun; the equation of time; the motions and phases of the moon; and affording a model whereon to illustrate the theory of the tides, lunar disturbances, &c.

těl-lür'-i-ön, * těl-lür'-i-üm, s. [Lat. tellus, genit. telluris = the earth; Eng. suff. -ism.] A modification of the hypothesis of animal magnetism, introduced by a German, Dr. Kieser, who attributed the phenomena to a telluric spirit or influence.

těl-lür'-rite, s. [Eng. tellurium; suff. -ite (Min.).]

Min.: A mineral found as an earthy incrustation, or in small spherical masses with radiated structure, on the native tellurium of Transylvania. Compos.: the same as tellurous acid (q.v.).

těl-lür'-rism, s. [Lat. tellus, genit. telluris = the earth; Eng. suff. -ism.] A modification of the hypothesis of animal magnetism, introduced by a German, Dr. Kieser, who attributed the phenomena to a telluric spirit or influence.

těl-lür'-rite, s. [Eng. tellurium; suff. -ite (Min.).]

Min.: A mineral found as an earthy incrustation, or in small spherical masses with radiated structure, on the native tellurium of Transylvania. Compos.: the same as tellurous acid (q.v.).

těl-lür'-i-üm, s. [TELLURIUM.]

1. Chem.: Symb. Te , At. Wt. 128. An element of rare occurrence, found in a few minerals in association with gold, silver, and bismuth. It possesses many of the characters of a metal, but bears so close a resemblance to selenium in its chemical properties that it is generally placed in the sulphur group. It has the colour and lustre of silver, is very brittle, a bad conductor of heat and electricity; sp. gr. 6.26; melts below a red heat, and volatilises at a higher temperature. Like sulphur, it forms both oxides and acids.

2. Min.: Occurs in six-sided prisms with basal edges replaced; crystallization hexagonal. Has lately been found in more complex forms; more often massive and granular. Hardness, 2 to 2.5; sp. gr. 6.1 to 6.3; lustre, metallic; colour, tin-white; brittle. Compos.: tellurium and gold, with occasionally some iron. Originally found at the Maria Loretto mine, Transylvania, where it was mistaken for the gold it contained. Recently found, associated with various tellurides, in several of the States of North America.

tellurium-glance, s. [NAOYACITE.]

těl-lür'-oüs, s. [Eng. tellurium; -ous.] Pertaining to tellurium.

tellurous-acid, s.

Chem.: H_2TeO_3 . A bulky precipitate prepared by dissolving tellurium in nitric acid of sp. gr. 1.25, and pouring the solution into water. It has a bitter metallic taste, is slightly soluble in water, but soluble in alkalis and acids.

tellurous-oxide, s.

Chem.: TeO_2 . A semi-crystalline powder prepared by heating tellurous acid to a low red heat. It is fusible, volatile, and slightly soluble in water.

těl-mät'-ō-lös'-tög, s. [Gr. τέλαμα (telma), genit. τέλαματος (telmatos) = a pond, a marsh, and ἄλοστis (alostis) = a robber.]

Palæont.: A genus of Limnotheridæ, from the Lower Eocene of Wyoming.

těl-mät'-or'-nīs, s. [Gr. τέλαμα (telma), genit. τέλαματος (telmatos) = a pond, a marsh, and ὄρνις (ornis) = a bird.]

Palæont.: A genus of fossil Gallatoræ, akin to the Rallidæ, from the Cretaceous rocks of North America.

těl-ō-dÿ-nām'-yo, s. [Gr. τῆλε (tele) = afar off, and Eng. dynamic (q.v.).] (See compound.)

telodynamic-cable, s. A means for transmitting power, originated by Hirn of Logelbach, in which high speed is employed to give the effect of great mass.

těl-ō-pē'-a, s. [Gr. τηλόπος (telopos) = seeing to a distance, seen at a distance; alluding to the great distance at which its crimson blossoms can be seen.]

Bot.: A genus of Grevillidæ. Leaves entire or slightly toothed; flowers in terminal clusters, surrounded by an involucre. Teleopea spectabilissima, the Waratah of New South Wales and Tasmania, is a splendid proteaceous shrub, cultivated in English greenhouses.

těl-ō-type, s. [Gr. τῆλε (tele) = afar off, and Eng. type.] A printing electric telegraph.

těl-phēr, s. & n. [TELPHERAGE.]

A. As substantive:

Elect.: The plant and rolling-stock of any system of telpherage (q.v.). The word was formed by the late Prof. F. Jenkin; but the example quoted under TELPHERAGE is the sole instance in which he used it as a substantive in the paper he read before the Society of Arts.

B. As adj.:

Of or belonging to telpherage; moved or moving automatically by the aid of electricity.

"We are enabled to start or stop any number of telpher trains without disturbing the running of others."—Prof. F. Jenkin, in Journ. Soc. Arts, xxiii, 658.

telpher-line, s.

Elect.: A line on which transport is automatically effected by the aid of electricity; an electric railway; specif., a line worked by Prof. Jenkin's system of telpherage. The first line was opened at Glynda, Sussex, Oct. 17, 1885, for the Newhaven Cement Company. It is a double line, nearly a mile long, composed of two sets of steel rails (a, a), supported on wooden T-shaped posts, about eighteen feet high. A wire is supported on each end of the cross-piece of the T, which is eight feet long. The carriers, or skeps (b), are of iron, and hold about two hundred weight each; they are furnished with handles by which their contents are tilted over by a man with a pole, or automatically tilted by these handles coming successively into contact with a wooden arm standing out from the post where it is desired that the skeps should be emptied. Ten of these carriers, which are in electrical connection with each other, form a train, and in the middle of the train is an electric motor (d). About half-a-mile from the starting-point is the engine-house containing the dynamo, whence the current is led to the line, and so to the motor in the centre of the train. A speed of four to five miles an hour is attained, and the working cost is about 3l. per ton, the skeps being empty on the return journey.

TELPHER-LINE.

•ōil, bōy; pōut, jōwī; eat, cēll, chorus, çhin, bēnç; go, çem; thin, çhis; sin, aç; expect, çenophon, eçist. ph = f. -cian, -tian = çhan. -tion, -sion = çhün; -çion, -çlon = çhün. -clous, -tlous, -sious = çhüs. -ble, -die, &c. = bēl, dēl.

The great practical advantage of a telpher-line is that it can be carried through a district without any interference with the fields, rivers, or roads, that cutting and tunnelling are not necessary, and that no ground has to be purchased, as for ordinary railways and tramways.

tēl'-phēr-age (agō'as īg), s. [Gr. τήλε (tēle) = afar off, and φέρω (phērō) = to bear. (See extract.)]

Elect.: (See extract.)

"In the first place it is necessary that I should define what is meant by the word telpherage, and perhaps that I should defend its formation. The word is intended to designate all modes of transport effected automatically with the aid of electricity. According to strict rules of derivation, the word would be 'telepherage'; but in order to avoid confusion with 'telephones,' and to get rid of the double accent in one word, which is disagreeable to my ear, I have ventured to give the new word such a form as it might have received after a few centuries of usage by English tongues, and to substitute the English-sounding telpher for 'telephore.'"—Prof. F. Jenkin, in Journ. Soc. Arts, xxxii. 62.

tēl'-sōn, s. [Gr. τέλειον (tēleion) = a limit.] Compar. Anal.: The last joint in the abdomen of the Crustacea. By some authorities it is regarded as a terminal somite without appendages, by other as an azygous appendage. The telson may be broad and spreading, as in the Lobster, or ensiform, as in the King Crab, while in the extinct Eurypterida its form was extremely variable. The name is also applied to the last joint of Scorpions, which has been modified into a weapon of offence.

tēit, pa. t. of v. [TELL.] Told. (Scotch.) "Na, man—Jame—Jame Stenison—I telt ye before."—Scott: Waverley, p. 59.

tē'mōn, s. [Native name.] A grain measure of Tripoli, containing nearly six gallons.

tēm'-ē-rā, s. [Ety. doubtful.] Ichthy.: A genus of Torpedinidae (q.v.), from tropical and sub-tropical seas. The teeth are blunt, and the dorsal fins are absent.

tēm'-ē-rār'-i-ōūs, a. [Lat. temerarius, from temere = rashly; Fr. téméraire; Ital. & Sp. temerario.] 1. Heedless or careless of consequences; unreasonably venturesome; rash, reckless, inconsiderate, headstrong.

"The theological faculty of Paris have condemned their doctrine as temerarious."—Bp. Taylor: A Discourse of Confirmation, § 1.

2. Careless, heedless; done at random. "The wit of man could not persuade him that this was done by the temerarious dashes of an unguided pen."—Ray: Creation.

tēm'-ē-rār'-i-ōūs-ly, adv. [Eng. temerarious; -ly.] In a temerarious manner; rashly, recklessly, heedlessly. "Mine opinion and sentence . . . I do not temerariouly define."—Burnet: Records, vol. 1, bk. III, No. 21.

tēm'-ē-rā'-tion, s. [Lat. temeratus, pa. pr. of temero = to pollute.] Pollution, contamination.

"The temeration of . . . popular preachers."—Jeremy Taylor: Sermons, III. 312.

tē-mēr'-i-tē, te-mer-i-tie, s. [Fr. témérité, from Lat. temeritatem, accus. of temeritas, from temere = rashly, from the same root as Sansc. tamas = darkness, dimness.] Heedlessness or recklessness of consequences; extreme venturesomeness; recklessness, rashness.

"He soon became, unfortunately for his country, bold even to temerity."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xv.

tēm'-ēr-ōūs, a. [Lat. temere = rashly.] Reckless, rash. "Temerous tauntress that delights in toys."—Franciscine Authors: Agt. an Unstaided Woman.

tēm'-ēr-ōūs-ly, adv. [Eng. temerous; -ly.] Recklessly, rashly. "Not that I temerouly define anything to come."—Bate: Image, pt. II, fo. 69.

tēm'-īn, s. [Native term.] A money of account in Algiers, equivalent to two cambers or twenty-nine aspers, about 17s. sterling.

Tēm'-mīnck, s. [C. J. Temminck, a Dutch naturalist, director of the Academy of Arts and Sciences at Haarlem, who from 1807 to 1815 published works on mammals and birds.] (See etym. and compounds.)

Temminck's bat, s. Zool.: Scotophilus temminckii, about three inches long, varying considerably in colour, generally dark olive-brown above, and reddish or yellowish white below. It has a wide range in the East.

Temminck's tragopan, s. Ornith.: Cerionis temminckii. [TRAGOOPAN.]

tēm'-nō-dōn, s. [Gr. τέμνω (temnō) = to cut; suff. -odon.]

Ichthy.: A genus of Carangidae, from tropical and sub-tropical seas. Body oblong, compressed, covered with cycloid scales of moderate size; mouth-cleft wide; strong teeth in jaws, smaller on vomer and palatine bone; no finlets; lateral line not shielded; anal and second dorsal covered with very small scales. Temnodon saltator, the Bluefish, is highly esteemed as food.

tēm'-pē'-an, a. [See def.] Of or pertaining to Tempe, a celebrated and beautiful vale in Thessaly, described by the poets as the most delightful spot on the earth; hence, fig., delightful, enchanting, lovely.

tēm'-pēr, tem-pre, tem-pri-on, v.t. & i. [Fr. tempérer = to temper, from Lat. tempero = to apportion, to moderate, to regulate, to qualify. Allied to tempus = time; tempori, tempori = seasonably; Sp. temperar, templar; Port. temperar; Ital. temperare.]

A. Transitive: 1. Ordinary Language: To moderate, to regulate, to govern, to control.

"With which the damned ghosts he governeth, And furles rules, and tartare perereth."—Spenser: Mother Hubbard's Tale, l. 294.

2. To reduce the excess, violence, harshness, or severity of; to qualify, to moderate, to soothe, to calm.

"O woman, lovely woman! Nature made thee To temper us: we had been brutes without you."—Shakespeare: Venice Preserved, l. 1.

3. To mingle, mix, or combine properly or in due proportion; to blend; to form by mixture; to compound.

"Then in a bowl he tempers generous wines, Around whose verge a mimic ivy twines."—Pope: Homer: Odyssey, xvi. 63.

4. To proportion duly as regards constituent parts; to unite or combine in due proportion; to adjust.

"God hath tempered the body together . . . that there should be no schism in the body, but that the members should have the same care one for another."—1 Corinth. xii. 24, 25.

5. To mix and work up. "The potter, tempering soft earth, fashioneth every vessel with much labour."—Wisdom xv. 7.

6. To qualify by the intermixture or addition of something to reduce to due condition by combining with something else.

"I shall temper so Justice with mercy, as may illustrate most Them fully satisfied, and thee appease."—Milton: P. L., x. 77.

7. To form to a proper degree of hardness. [TEMPERING.] "We must do as the smiths who temper iron."—P. Holland: Plutarch, p. 95.

* 8. To fashion, to mould, to dispose. "Tis she, That tempers him to this extremity."—Shakespeare: Richard III., l. 1.

* 9. To warm. "What wax so frozen but dissolves with tempering?"—Shakespeare: Venus & Adonis, 658.

II. Technically: 1. Founding: To moisten and work up to a proper consistency; as, To temper clay. 2. Music: To adjust, as the scale of tones or sounds of a fixed-toned instrument, so as to enable it to be played in any key; to raise or lower slightly as the various notes of an instrument, so that the intervals to each key shall be as far as possible equally agreeable. [TEMPERING.]

* B. Intransitive: 1. To have or acquire a proper or desired state or quality; to become soft and pliable. "I have him already tempering between my finger and my thumb, and shortly will I seal with him."—Shakespeare: 2 Henry IV., iv. 2.

2. To accord; to act and think in accord or conformity. "Few men rightly temper with the stars."—Shakespeare: 8 Henry VI., iv. 6.

tēm'-pēr, s. [TEMPER, v.; cf. Lat. temperies = a tempering, right admixture.]

I. Ordinary Language: * 1. Bodily temperament; that constitution of body arising from the due blending or mixture of the four principal humours. [TEMPERAMENT I. 3.]

"The exquiliteness of his [the Saviour's] bodily temper increased the exquiliteness of his torment."—Fuller: Pious Sight, l. 845.

2. Due mixture of different qualities; the state of any compound substance which results from the mixture of various ingredients.

"Nothing better proveth the excellency of this soil and temper, than the abundant growing of the palmettes."—Kentish: Hist. World.

* 3. Middle course, state, or character; mean, medium. "If the estates of some bishops were exorbitant before the reformation, the present clergy's wishes reach no further than that some reasonable temper had been used, instead of paring them so quick."—Swift: Miscellanies.

* 4. Calmness of mind; moderation, self-restraint, temperateness. "Oh! blessed with temper, whose unclouded ray Can make to-morrow cheerful as to-day."—Pope: Moral Essays, II. 257.

5. Disposition of mind; constitution of the mind, especially as regards the passions and affections.

"His temper, in spite of manifold vexations and provocations, was always cheerful and serene."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xiv.

6. Mood, humour, disposition. "Thus the nation was in such a temper that the smallest spark might raise a flame."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. II.

7. Heat of mind or passion; proneness or disposition to give way to anger, rage, or passion; irritation.

8. Habits; natural inclinations. "Such as have a knowledge of the town may easily class themselves with tempers congenial to their own."—Goldsmith: Essays, l.

9. The state of a metal, particularly as regards its hardness. "The hot pieces of iron he would hammer out . . . and harden them to a good temper as there was occasion."—Dampier: Voyages (an. 1685).

10. Quality. "His courage was of the truest temper; his understanding strong hot narrow."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xv.

11. An alloy used by pewterers, consisting of two parts of tin to one of copper.

II. Sugar-manuf.: Milk of lime, or its equivalent, added to boiling syrup to clarify it and neutralize the superabundant acid.

¶ For the difference between temper, disposition, and frame, see DISPOSITION.

temper-screw, s. 1. Well-boring: A piece by which the tools are suspended from the walking beam, and are lowered as the drilling progresses.

2. A set-screw for adjustment; one which brings its point against a bearing or an object.

tēm'-pēr'-s, a. [Ital.] Paint.: The same as DISTEMPER (2) (q.v.).

* tēm'-pēr'-a-ble, a. [Eng. temper; -able.] Capable of being tempered.

tēm'-pēr-a-mēt, s. [Lat. temperamentum = a mean, moderation, from tempero = to moderate, to temper (q.v.).]

I. Ordinary Language: * 1. A compromise or middle ground on which two contending parties can meet; a medium between two extreme opinions; a middle course or an arrangement reached by mutual concession, or by tempering the extreme claims on either side; adjustment of opposing influences, or the means by which such an adjustment is effected.

"However, I forejudge not any probable expedient, any temperament that can be found in things of this nature, so disputable on either side."—Milton: Ready and Easy Way to Establish a Free Commonwealth.

2. State with regard to the relative proportion of different qualities or constituent parts constitution; due mixture of opposite or different qualities; a condition arising from the proper blending of various qualities. "Galen was not a better physician than an ill doctrine, while he determines the soul to be the complexion and temperament of the prime qualities."—Bp. Hall: The Invisible World, bk. ix., § 1.

3. That individual peculiarity of physical organization, by which the manner of acting, feeling, and thinking of each person is permanently affected. Temperament, called by the Greeks κράσις (krasis), meaning a mixture or tempering of elements, was anciently supposed to arise from the union of two or more of the entities, heat, cold, drought, or moisture, corresponding to the so-called elements, fire, air, earth, and water. There were four fāte, fāt, fāre, amidst, whāt, fāll, father; wē, wēt, hēre, camēl, hēr, thēre; pine, pīt, sīre, sūr, marine; gō, pōt, or, wōre, wōlf, wōrk, whō, sōn; mūte, cūb, cūre, unīte, cūr, rūle, fūll; trȳ, Sȳrian. æ, œ = ē: ey = ā; qu = kw.

temperaments, recognized by Hippocrates, which he supposes to have arisen from the mixture of four secondary or compound elements, blood, phlegm or pituita, yellow bile, and black bile. Blood is supposed by him to be a combination of hot and moist, phlegm of cold and moist, yellow bile of hot and dry, and black bile of cold and dry. Whilst his explanation is rejected, his four temperaments are still recognized under the names of the Sanguine or Sanguineous, the Lymphatic or Phlegmatic, the Choleric or Biliary, and the Melancholic or Atrabillious temperaments. (See these words.)

*4. Condition, as to heat or cold; temperamenture.
 "They do not provide [refreshments] in proportion to the fertility of the soil, and the temperment of the climate."—Cook: First Voyage, bk. III., ch. xiv.

II. Musical: in its broadest sense, the division of the octave; in a narrower sense, the modification of intervals from their strict mathematical value in order to secure a recurring and interchangeable series in consecutive octaves. The most common form of temperment is that now used on pianofortes and organs, known as Equal Temperment, in which the octave is divided into twelve equal parts called mean semitones; but in order to secure this, the fifths have to be slightly flatter than 3 : 2, and the thirds considerably sharper than 5 : 4. If thirds and fifths be required in just intonation, the number of keys on keyed instruments must be inconveniently multiplied; such instruments are sometimes called enharmonic. Systems of Unequal Temperment are such as secure perfect correctness in certain common keys at the sacrifice of the intonation of those more remote.

¶ For the difference between temperament and frame, see FRAME.

tēm-pēr-a-mēt'-al, a. [Eng. temperament; -al.] Constitut'al; pertaining to the temperament.

"And by it, 'tis easie to give an account of dreames, both moody and temperamental, enthusiasms, fantastick extasies, and the like."—Glauill, Ess. 6.

tēm-pēr-a-mēt'-al-ly, adv. [Eng. temperamentally; -ly.] In temperament; as regards temperament.

"Not more unlike, physically or temperamentally, were Brebeuf and Lalemant."—Scribner's Magazine, May, 1890, p. 69.

tēm-pēr-an-çe, tēm-pēr-an-çy, tem-por-auce, s. [Fr. temperance, from Lat. temperantia = moderation, temperance, from temperans, pr. par. of tempero = to temper (q.v.); Sp. temperancia; Port. temperança; Ital. temperanza, temperanza. Sir Thomas Eliot, writing in 1534, says that the word was not then in general use.]

1. Moderation; observance of moderation; temperateness; specifically—

(1) Self-restraint; moderation of passion; patience, calmness. (Milton: P. L., xii. 583.)

(2) Habitual moderation in regard to the indulgence of the natural appetites and passions; abstinence from all excess, improper indulgence, or the use of anything injurious to moral or physical well-being; restrained or moderate indulgence; in a more limited sense, abstinence from or moderation in the use of intoxicating liquors. (Milton: P. L., xi. 531.)

*2. Chastity. (Shakesp.: Rape of Lucrece, 884.)

*3. Agreeable temperature; mild climate.
 "It [the island] must needs be of subtle, tender, and delicate temperance."—Shakesp.: Tempest, ii. 1.

¶ Temperance is frequently used adjectively, as a temperance society, a temperance meeting, &c.

temperance hospital, s.

Med.: A hospital in which alcohol is not used as a beverage, and is only employed very sparingly and under test conditions as a medicine. Hospitals conducted on this principle exist in the United States and England, for the treatment of patients in whom the appetite for spirits has become a disease. The experience of physicians in these hospitals has been very favorable, and seems to justify the principle of treating patients without alcohol.

temperance-hotel, s. An hotel where no intoxicating liquors are supplied.

temperance-movement, s.

Hist.: A movement designed (1) to minimize or (2) to abolish the use of alcoholic liquors as beverages. In the first sense the word "temperance" is used strictly, i.e., the aim at moderation in the use of liquors; in the second sense it is equivalent to total abstinence. The Jewish Nazarites and Rechabites acted on total abstinence principles (Num. vi. 1-21, Jer. xxxv. 1-6) [TISCHACHTZ (1)], as did the Eucratites (q.v.) of the second Christian century. Most of the higher Hindoo castes and all the Muhammadans nominally abstain from intoxicating liquor. The earliest modern temperance order was that of St. Christopher, founded in Germany in 1517, the members of which were pledged not to drink more than seven goblets of liquor at a meal "except in cases where this measure was not sufficient to quench thirst." In 1600 the Landgrave of Hesse established another temperance order. America was earlier than Britain in the modern temperance movement. In 1651 the people of East Hampton, Long Island, endeavoured to limit the sale of intoxicating drinks. In 1760 the religious societies began to protest against drinking at funerals; in 1789 a resolution was passed by farmers to abstain from liquor during that season; and in 1790 medical men, led by Dr. Rush, protested against the use of spirits, and four years later he recommended total abstinence. The first total abstinence pledge was drafted by Micajah Pendleton, of Virginia. In 1812 the Rev. H. Humphrey recommended total abstinence, as did Dr. Lyman Beecher, and various temperance societies arose. Not, however, till 1836 was the American Temperance Union formed on the basis of total abstinence. From 1845 commenced the various orders with ritual and insignia, which have gradually been extended to or imitated in Britain. As early as 1818 a total abstinence society, believed to have been the first in date throughout the world, had been founded at Skibbereen, in Ireland. On October 2 and 5, 1829, temperance societies were formed at Maryhill, near Glasgow, and in Greenock; and the Glasgow and West of Scotland Temperance Society was instituted on November 12, 1829. In England the movement began at Bradford in February, 1830. The British and Foreign Temperance Society was formed in London early in 1831. In 1835 Mr. Joseph Livesey started the teetotal temperance movement in England. In 1838 Father Theobald Mathew, a Capuchin friar, became the apostle of temperance for Ireland, and by the end of 1839 obtained 1,800,000 recruits to the cause. By 1835 the temperance movement had made great progress in the United States, the membership in the societies formed up to that time being very large. During the succeeding ten years the cause actively advanced, total abstinence being adopted in place of the limited anti-spirit principle. The Washingtonian movement, begun in 1840, is said to have gained in the course of a few years a quarter million signatures to its pledge. What had been a social, soon became a political movement, and in 1851 the State of Maine passed an Anti-liquor Law, which is still maintained; the law, though largely evaded in the cities, being productive of very beneficial results. Similar laws were passed in New Hampshire and Vermont, and at a later date in several of the Western States, and at present prohibition of liquor traffic is incorporated in the constitutions of Maine, Kansas, North and South Dakota. In addition to this state movement, a local option movement was inaugurated in many states, county or city prohibition being decreed. This is particularly active in the South, in some of whose states local option generally prevails. After the Civil War a National Temperance Society and publication house was established, with headquarters in New York. This has distributed an immense amount of useful literature bearing upon this subject. The Woman's Crusade against the liquor traffic, which began in 1873, ended in the formation of the Women's Christian Temperance Union, one of the most effective agencies now in the field. The Red and Blue Ribbon movements followed, the influence of the Roman Catholic Church was exerted in favor of temperance, and other churches were aroused to a participation in the movement. In the British Islands a similarly active propaganda was inaugurated. Bands of Hope were founded which now include more than 2,000,000 juvenile members, the American Order of Good Templars was adopted and various other active steps were taken, with promising results. On the continent of Europe the temperance movement has not progressed satisfactorily, its most effective operation being in Sweden and Norway. The nearly unrestricted immigration of Europeans to the United States is a main cause of the degree of intemperance which now exists in this country, and necessitates a continued activity of the temperance organizations.

temperance-society, s.

1. A society pledging its members to temperance or moderation in the use of intoxicating liquors.

2. A total abstinence society, or, in some cases, a society on a double basis, so that a member may profess either temperance (1) or total abstinence. [TEMPERANCE MOVEMENT.]

"Memory depends upon the consistence and the temperature of the brain."—Watts.

*3. Mixture, combination; that which is made by mixture; a compound, a combination.

"Now the first of these, and the foundation of all the rest, is a proper temperature of fear and love; two affections, which ought never to be separated in thinking of God."—Secker: Sermons, vol. II, ser. 1.

*4. The temper of metals.

"Taking thereby the due temperature of stiff steel."—P. Holland: Plutarch, p. 98.

*5. Moderate degree of atmospheric heat; temperateness of climate.

"If, instead of this variation of heat, we suppose an equality or constant temperature of it before the deluge, the case would be much altered."—Woodward: Nat. Hist.

6. In the same sense as II.

II. Physics: Intensity of radiant heat. The temperature of any body is the extent to which it tends to impart sensible heat to other bodies. The temperature of a body may be altered by adding to it or withdrawing from it a certain amount of radiant heat. A cupful of boiling water taken from a boiler remains for a short time at as high a temperature as that in the larger vessel, but the limited amount of heat which it can radiate has a much less effect in raising that of other bodies. The temperature of any given body is determined by its specific heat (q.v.). For very high temperature it is measured by a pyrometer (q.v.), for ordinary temperature, by a thermometer (q.v.). (For the causes which regulate the temperature of the several countries, see Climate and Isotherms.) Temperature is often used in connection with the animal body. In the warm-blooded animals, birds, and mammals, the temperature of the body remains constant at 35° to 40° C., whatever be the heat of the air. The temperature of man is about 37°-38° C. (99°-70° Fahr.); in the wolf it is said to be as low as 35°-24° C., while in the swallow it is 44° C. In the cold-blooded animals it is but slightly raised above the surrounding air. In the frog it is rarely more than 64° to 65° C., above that of the atmosphere, and in a species of python it is 12° C., while Huber found that in a beehive it rose at times to 40° C. Plants as a rule do not greatly vary in temperature from the surrounding atmosphere, except when they flower, when their heat rises some degrees. The probable cause is the increased absorption of oxygen and the formation of a large quantity of carbon dioxide. Minerals and rocks vary in their radiant heat, partly as they are exposed to external heat, partly according to the nature of chemical changes, if any, which they are undergoing.

"How much the temperature of the air varies here I myself could sensibly perceive."—Cook: Third Voyage, bk. I, ch. II.

temperature-alarm, s. A mechanical contrivance which automatically makes a signal when the temperature of the place where it is located exceeds or falls below a determinate point.

tēm-pōred, a. [Eng. temper, s.; -ed.]

1. Having a certain temper or disposition; disposed; usually in composition, as good-tempered, hot-tempered, &c.

"If I had not an excellent tempered patience, now should I break this fellow's head."—Beaumont & Fletcher: Coxcomb, II.

2. Subjected to and improved by the operation of tempering (q.v.); hardened.

"This sceptre, formed by tempered steel to prove An ensign of the delegates of love." Pope: Homer; Iliad I, 314.

tempered-glass, s. [TOUGHENED-GLASS.]

tempered-steel, s. [STEEL, s., II. 1.]

tēm-pōr-ōr, s. [Eng. temper, v.; -er.] One who or that which tempers; specif., a machine in which articles are ground together, with the addition of a proper quantity of water, to intimately commingle them and develop the plasticity. Sand and lime thus tempered form mortar; clay thus tempered becomes fit for the potter's use.

tēm-pōr-ing, pr. par., a., & s. [TEMPER, v.]

A. & B. As pr. par. & particip. adj.: (See the verb.)

C. As substantive:

Metal-work: The process of producing in a metal, particularly steel, that peculiar degree of hardness and elasticity which adapts it for any of the purposes to which it is to be applied. The malleable metals generally increase in hardness by being hammered or rolled, and hammer-hardening—that is, hammering without the application of heat, is frequently employed for hardening some kinds of steel springs. Steel is for most purposes hardened by plunging it while hot into water, oil, or other liquid, to cool it suddenly. Nearly every kind of steel requires a particular degree of heat to impart to it the greatest hardness of which it is susceptible. If heated, and suddenly cooled below that degree, it becomes as soft as iron; if heated beyond that degree, it becomes very hard, though brittle; and its brittleness is an indication of the degree of its heat, when cooled off. By the common method the steel is over-heated, plunged in cold water, and then annealed or tempered by being so far re-heated that oil and tallow will burn on its surface; or the surface is ground and polished, and the steel reheated until it assumes a certain colour. The gradations of colour consecutively follow: a light straw-yellow, violet, blue, and finally gray or black, when the steel again becomes as soft as though it had never been hardened. Bronze is tempered by a process reverse to that adopted with steel. Cooling bronze slowly hardens it. The sudden cooling makes it less fragile, and is adopted with gongs.

* tēm-pōr-lōss, * tēm-pōr-lōsse, a. [Eng. temper; -less.] Without temper or moderation.

"So temperless, tempted with Fortune's smile," Dryden: Panaretus, 1, 374.

tēm-pōst, s. [O. Fr. tempeste (Fr. tempeste, from a Low Lat. *tempestis; Lat. tempestas = reason, weather, good or bad, a storm; allied to tempus = time; Sp. tempestad; Ital. tempesta.)]

I. Lit.: A violent storm; a storm of extreme violence, a gale, a hurricane; an extensive current of wind rushing with great velocity, and commonly attended with heavy rain, hail, or snow.

"Alas, 'tis ye wild tempest, and cover his flight!" Corneille: Le Cid, II, 4, 10.

¶ In the Middle the word tempest always means a thunderstorm. It is generally used without the article: as, The sky threatens tempest.

II. Figuratively:

1. A violent tumult, commotion, or agitation; perturbation, storm, tumult.

"Even the king stood aghast for a moment at the violence of the tempest which he had raised." Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. VIII.

* 2. A fashionable assembly. (See extract.)

"Drum: This is a riotous assembly of fashionable people, of both sexes, and of various conditions of some hundreds; not exactly styled a drum, from the noise and emptiness of the entertainment. There are also drum-major, rout, temper, and hurricanes, differing only in degree of multitude and noise, as the sign's cant name of each declares." Swift: Advice. (Note to line 30.)

tempest-beaten, a. Beaten or shaken as by a tempest.

"All its tempest-beaten turlets slunk," Cooper: Task, v. 27.

tempest-god, s.

Anthrop.: A deity supposed to preside over storms and tempests.

"Descending southward to Central America, there is found mention of the bird Voc, the messenger of Hurakan, the Tempest-god (whose name has been adopted in European languages as hurricane, ouragan, hurricane) of the lightning and of the Thunder." Taylor: Prim. Cult. (ed. 1873), p. 368.

tempest-tossed, a. Tossed or driven about by storm.

"Without a sudden calm, will overset Thy tempest-tossed body." Shakespeare: Romeo & Juliet, III, 5.

* tēm-pōst, v. t. & i. [TEMPEST, s.]

A. Transitive:

1. Lit.: To disturb by or as by a tempest.

"Let him . . . tempt the air With volleys thunders and wild warring words." R. Potter: Aschylus; Prometheus Chained.

2. Fig.: To disturb greatly, to agitate.

"His ample chest all tempered with force," Thomson: Liberty.

B. Intrans.: To pour out a tempest; to storm.

"Thunder and tempest on those learned heads, Whom Cæsar with his honour doth advance," Ben Jonson: Poetaster, v. 1.

* tēm-pēs-tīve, a. [Lat. tempestivus, from tempestas = a season.] Seasonable.

"Neither obscured from the comfortable beams of the sun, nor covered from the cheerful and tempestive showers of heaven."—Haywood: Hierarchy of Angels, p. 382.

* tēm-pēs-tīve-lŷ, adv. [Eng. tempestive; -ly.] Seasonably; in proper season or time.

"Dancing is a pleasant recreation of the body and mind, if temperately used."—Burton: Anat. of Melancholy, p. 499.

* tēm-pēs-tīv-ī-tŷ, s. [TEMPESTIVE.] Seasonableness.

"The constitutions of countries admit not such tempestivity of harvest."—Browne: Vulgar Errors, bk. vi, ch. III.

tēm-pēs-tŷ-ōus, a. [Fr. tempestueux, from Lat. tempestuosus.]

1. Very stormy, rough, turbulent.

"Like him, cross'd cheerfully tempestuous seas, Forsaking country, kindred, friends and ease," Cooper: Hops, 514.

2. Turbulent, violent, agitated, stormy.

"Melville, on whom the chief responsibility lay, sat on the throne in profound silence through the whole of this tempestuous debate."—Mansel: Hist. Eng., ch. xvi.

3. Blowing with violence; very rough-boisterous.

* 4. Subject to fits of violent passion; passionate.

tēm-pēs-tŷ-ōūs-lŷ, adv. [Eng. tempestuous; -ly.] In a tempestuous manner; with great violence of wind; with great commotion or agitation; stormily.

"A touch of her, his blood would ebb and flow, And his cheek change tempestuously." Byron: Dream, II.

tēm-pēs-tŷ-ōūs-nēss, s. [Eng. tempestuous; -ness.] The quality or state of being tempestuous; storminess.

tēm-pla, a. pl. [Lat., pl. of templum = a temple.]

Arch.: Certain timbers introduced in the roofs of temples. They were placed upon the entablature, or principal rafters, extending the whole length of the temple from one fastigium to the other, corresponding in situation and use with the common purlins.

tēm-plar, * tēm-plōr, * tem-plere, s. & a. [Low Lat. templarius; from Lat. templum = a temple (q.v.); Sp. & Port. templario; Fr. templier.]

A. As substantive:

1. A member of the order called Templars, Knights Templars, Knights of the Temple, Soldiers of the Temple, Brothers of the Temple of Solomon at Jerusalem, and Soldiers of Christ. It was founded in 1118 or 1119 by nine Christian knights, of whom the chief were Hugues de Payens or de Pagnons and Geoffroi de St. Omer or Ademar. These two leaders had only one horse between them; hence the seal of the order had two armed knights one behind another on the same horse. Their sole support was the alms of the faithful, and they were often called the Pauper soldiers. The original object of their association was to maintain free passage for the pilgrims visiting the Holy Land. Baldwin II, King of Jerusalem, accommodated them in part of his palace, while the abbot and canon of the church and convent of the Temple gave them a building wherein to keep their arms, whence they were called Templars. They soon rose to great power and wealth. In 1128 de Payens, with some of his followers, requested the Council of Troyes to frame a rule for the order. One was accordingly drawn up, and confirmed the same year by Pope Honorius II. In 1146 Eugenius III. enjoined them to wear a red cross on their left breast and on their banner. [BAISEANT.] Further privileges were conferred upon the order by Pope Alexander III. in 1162. The head of the Templars was called the Grand Master, and was elected by the chapter or general body of the knights; under him was a seneschal or lieutenant. Every country in which the order had possessions was called a Province, and was ruled by a grand prior, grand preceptor, or provincial master. Under these were priors, bailiffs, or masters, and subordinate to these, preceptors, each ruling over a preceptory—that is, a house, or two or more adjacent houses viewed as one establishment. Spiritual members called chaplains were also admitted, with aerarial brethren, some of whom bore arms as esquires to the knights, fāte, fāt, fāro, āmidst, whāt, fāll, fāther; wē, wēt, hēre, camēl, hōr, thōre; pīno, pīt, sīro, marīns; gō, pōt, or, wōre, wōlf, wōrk, whō, sōn; mūte, ōub, ōure, ōnto, ōūr, ōūle, fūll; trŷ, Sŷrian. æ, œ = ē; oy = ī; qu = kw.

while others practised handicrafts. There were, moreover, affiliated members, with children dedicated to the order by their parents, and grown-up persons pledged to its defence. During the period of the Crusades the valour of the knights was of great use to the Christian armies, and would have been still more so had there been proper cooperation between them and the Knights Hospitalers, who had been transformed into a second military order. When Jerusalem was taken by the Muhammadans in 1187, the Templars retired first to Antioch, then to Acre, then to the Pilgrims' Castle near Caesarea, and finally to Limleso (now Limasol) in Cyprus. In 1306 Philip the Fair, king of France, a determined enemy of the Church, lured Jacques de Molay, Master of the Temple, to Paris. On Sept. 13, 1307, he and all the Templars in France were simultaneously arrested. In December the English Templars who were settled at the spot in London still called the Temple were also arrested. In August, 1308, Pope Clement V., who was in the power of the King of France, and under moral coercion, issued a bull calling upon all Christian princes and prelates to assist him in examining into the guilt of the order. To obtain evidence he issued a commission, which began on Aug. 7, 1309, and continued its investigations for about two years. The charges were gross immorality and impiety. After a General Council, held at Vienna in October, 1311, had been found unconvicted, Clement, on March 22, 1312, abolished the order, and on March 18, 1314, Molay, the Grand Master of the Templars, and Grey, Grand Prior of Normandy, were burnt to death. A mind possessing the judicial instinct looks with suspicion on charges brought first by two ex-Templars who had no friendly feeling to the order they had left. It cannot attach weight to evidence obtained solely by torture, and when it finds that the chief defendants were burnt alive to silence them, and died asserting their own innocence and that of their order, and that the King of France, the instigator of the proceedings, besides having a quarrel to avenge, had an adverse verdict, as it would enable him to seize the Templars' wealth amounting to some millions of pounds, it has little hesitation in declaring that the charges against the order were unproved, and that the treatment they received was a deep-dyed crime.

"So that the ere hadde no remedy but to withdrawe him asoon as he might, into a place of the temples closed with stowe walles."—Berners: Prologue; Cronycle, vol. II, ch. cxcv.

2. A student of the law; a lawyer, so called from having chambers in this Temple, in London. [TEMPLE.]

3. A member of the order of Good Templars. "He had often feared lest any of . . . their juvenile temples should be decoyed away on their journey to or from the meetings."—Daily Chronicle, Sept. 3, 1854.

* B. As adj.: Of or pertaining to a temple.
 ¶ (1) Free Templar: [FREE, a.]
 (2) Good Templar: [GOOD.]

tēm-plāte, s. [TEMPLET.] A mould or pattern used by moul ders, bricklayers, machinists, &c., in laying off their work. It frequently consists of a flat, thin board, whose edge is dressed and shaped to the required conformation, and it is laid against the object being moulded, built, or turned, so as to test the conformity of the object thereto.

"Template [is] an improper orthography for templet . . . a mould used in masonry for the cutting or setting out of the work."—Guilt: Encyc. Architecture; Glossary.

tēm-plō (1), s. [A.S. templ, tempel, from Low Lat. templum = a temple, originally a part cut off and set apart for religious purposes, from the same root as Gr. τέμενον (temno) = to cut; cf. Gr. τέμενος (temenos) = a sacred enclosure; Sp. & Port. templo; Ital. templo, tempio.]

1. Literally:
 1. An edifice erected and dedicated to the service of some deity or deities, and connected with some pagan system of worship. The term is generally applied to such structures among the Greeks, Romans, Egyptians, and other ancient nations, as well as to structures serving the same purpose among modern heathen nations. Among all ancient nations the usual plan of a temple was rectangular, seldom circular. Among the Greeks rectangular temples were classed in forms, according to their architectural peculiarities; viz.:

(1) The temple in antis, in which the pteromata, or ends of the side walls, project so as to form pilaster-like piers called antis, between which are columns, generally two in number.

(2) The prostyle, in which the pronaos, or porch, is formed in its entire breadth by a disposition of columns, generally four in number, so that the corner columns stand in front of the antis, with an intervening space.

(3) The amphiprostyle, in which both the front and back of the temple have the prostyle arrangement.

(4) The peristyle or peripteral, surrounded by columns on all sides, in which the front and back frequently have double rows of columns, and are both hexastyle.

(5) The pseudoperipteral, occurring extremely rarely in Grecian architecture, in which the peripteral is imitated by columns attached to the walls.

(6) The dipteral, surrounded by a double colonnade, with porticos of from eight to ten columns in front.

(7) The pseudodipteral, which rarely occurs, is a dipteral with the inner range of columns omitted throughout.

The circular temples were of three kinds:—

(1) The most usual was the peripteral, which had a circular cella, or cell, surrounded by a colonnade.

(2) The monopteral, which was an open circle of columns supporting a roof or entablature, and consequently without a cella.

(3) The pseudoperipteral, in which, as in the oblong pseudoperipteral, the columns were attached to the walls of the cella.

These circular temples, which are far from common, and in which Corinthian columns are usually employed, were, for the most part, intended for the worship of Vesta. A further distinction was made in temples according to the number of columns in front; this number, however, was always an even one. They are called tetrastyle, hexastyle, octastyle, decastyle, &c., according as they had four, six, eight, ten, &c., columns. Among the Etruscans the form of the temples differed from the Grecian, the ground-plan more nearly approaching a square, the sides being in the proportion of 5 to 6. The interior of these temples was divided into two parts, the front portion being an open portico resting on pillars, whilst the back part contained the sanctuary itself, and consisted of three cellae placed alongside one another. The intercolumnation was considerably greater than in Grecian temples. Among the Romans a temple, in the restricted sense of an edifice set apart for the worship of the gods, consisted essentially of two parts only: a small apartment or sanctuary, the cella, sometimes merely a niche for receiving the image of the god, and an altar standing in front of it, upon which were placed the offerings of the suppliant. The general form—whether circular, square, or oblong; whether covered with a roof, or open to the sky; whether plain and destitute of ornament, or graced by stately colonnades with elaborately sculptured friezes and pediments—depended entirely upon the taste of the architect and the liberality of the founders, but in no way increased or diminished the sanctity of the building. In so far as position was concerned, a temple, whenever circumstances permitted, was placed east and west, the opening immediately opposite to the cella being on the west side, so that those who stood before the altar with their eyes fixed upon the god, looked towards the east. The most celebrated temples of the ancients were those of Jupiter Olympus in Athens, of Diana (or Artemis) at Ephesus, of Apollo at Delphi, and of Vesta at Tivoli and Rome.

2. An edifice erected among Christians as a place of public worship; a church.

3. The name of two semi-monastic establishments of the middle ages—one in London, the other in Paris—inhabited by the Knights Templars. The Temple Church in London is the only portion of either now existing. On the site of the London establishment have been erected the two Inns of Courts known as the Inner and Middle Temples, which are occupied by barristers, and are the property of two societies called the Societies of the Inner and of the Middle Temple, who have the right of calling persons to the degree of barrister.

II. Fig.: A place in which the divine presence especially resides.

"Know ye not that your body is the temple of the Holy Ghost?"—1 Corinth. vi. 19.

¶ The Jewish Temple:

Jewish Antiquities: The building reared by Solomon as a habitation for Jehovah, though the king was aware that God could not be confined to an earthly edifice, or even to the heaven of heavens (1 Kings viii. 27). David had planned the Temple, but was divinely forbidden to erect it, as he had shed so much blood in his wars (1 Chron. xxii. 8). He, however, made great preparations for his son and successor, who, he learned from the prophet Nathan (2 Sam. vii. 13), was destined to achieve the work. It was built on Mount Moriah (2 Chron. iii. 1), chiefly by Tyrian workmen, and had massive foundations. Its dimensions were 60 cubits (90 feet) long; 20 cubits (30 feet) wide, and 30 cubits (45 feet) high. The stone for its erection was dressed before its arrival, so that the edifice arose noiselessly (1 Kings vi. 7); the floor was of cedar, boarded over with planks of fir; the wainscoting was of cedar, covered with gold, as was the whole interior. It was modelled inside on the tabernacle, which was Jehovah's appropriate dwelling while journeyings were continually taking place, as the Temple was now that these had ceased. There was therefore a Holy and a Most Holy Place. The temple was surrounded by an inner court for the priests. There was also a Great or Outward Court (2 Chron. iv. 9; Ezek. xl. 17), called specially the Court of the Lord's House (Jer. xix. 14, xxvi. 2). This temple was destroyed by the Babylonians during the siege of Jerusalem under Nebuchadnezzar (2 Kings xxv. 9; 2 Chron. xxxvi. 19). On the return from Babylon, a temple, far inferior to Solomon's was commenced under Zerubbabel, b.c. 534, and, after a long intermission, was resumed b.c. 520, and completed b.c. 516, under Darius Hystaspes (Ezra iii. 7, vi. 15). The second temple was gradually removed by Herod, as he proceeded with the building or rebuilding of a temple designed to rival the first rather than the second. This work was commenced b.c. 21 or 20; the temple itself was finished in about a year and a half, the courts in eight years, but the subsequent operations were carried on so dilatorily that the Jews reckoned forty-six years as the whole time consumed (John ii. 20). In the courts of this temple Jesus preached and healed the sick. It caught fire during the siege of Jerusalem under Titus, and notwithstanding his efforts to save it, was burnt to the ground. (Josephus: Wars of the Jews.) tēm-plō (2), s. [O. Fr. temples = the temples (Fr. temple), from Lat. tempora = the temples, pl. of tempus = a temple.] The flat portion of either side of the head above the cheekbone, or between the forehead and ear. They are distinguished as right and left temples. (Generally used in the plural.)

"I'll chafe her temples, yet there's nothing stirr'd."
Beaumont & Fletcher: Maid's Tragedy, v.

tēm-plō (3), s. [TEMPLET.]

1. Heaving: An instrument for keeping cloth its proper breadth while the reed beats up against it in the process of weaving.

2. One of the bars on the outer ends of the spectacle bows by which the spectacles are made to clasp the head of the wearer.

* tēm-plō, v.t. [TEMPLE (1), s.] To build a temple for; to appropriate a temple to; to include in a temple.

"The heathen (in many places) templed and adorned this drunken god."—Feltham: Revoles, pt. 1, res. 84.

* tēm-plō-less, a. [Eng. temple (1), s.; -less.] Devoid of a temple.

tēm-plōt, s. [Cf. Low Lat. templatus = vaulted; Fr. templet = a stretcher; Lat. templum = a small timber.]

1. Much, &c.: A template (q.v.)

2. Building:

(1) A short piece of timber or large stone placed in a wall to receive the impost of a girder, breastsummer, or beam, and distribute its weight; a wall-plate; a torsal.

(2) A plate spanning a window or door space to sustain joists and throw their weight on the piers.

"Our bodies we get templified."—Andrews: Works, II, 361.

tēm'-plīn, s. [Etym. doubtful.] (See compound.)

templin-oil, s.

Chem.: Oil of pine-cones. Obtained by distilling the cones of the Silver-fir or of Pinus pumilla. It is colourless, but becomes greenish-yellow on exposure to the air, has an odour of lemon, sp. gr. 0.862 at 12°, and boils between 155° and 200°, the greater part distilling over about 175°. It agrees with oil of turpentine in its solubility and refracting power.

tēm'-pō, s. [Ital. = time; Lat. tempus.]

Music: A word used to denote the degree of quickness or rate of movement at which a piece is to be performed; as, Tempo comodo = convenient, easy, moderate time; tempo ordinario = ordinary time; tempo primo = first or original time.

tēm'-pōr-āl (1), tēm'-pōr-all, tem-por-ell, a. & s. [O. Fr. temporal, from Lat. temporalis = temporal, from tempus, genit. temporis = time, season, opportunity; Sp. & Port. temporal; Fr. temporel; Ital. temporale.]

temporal-lords, s. pl. The peers of a realm, as distinguished from the archbishops and bishops, or lords spiritual.

temporal-power, a.Church History:

1. The power which the Pope exercised as sovereign of the States of the Church. [TIARA, s.] Pius VII. was partially deprived of his dominions by Napoleon I. in 1797, and entirely in 1808. The Pope replied by a bull of excommunication; he was then arrested and kept a close prisoner in France till the fall of Napoleon in 1814, when he was reinstated in the government of an undiminished territory. The temporal power was again attacked in 1848, when Pius IX. was driven from Rome, and a republic was established by Mazzini and Garibaldi. In 1849 General Oudinot was sent by Louis Napoleon, President of the French Republic, to Rome, and his army drove out the revolutionists and brought the Pope back. For ten years the Pope's power was not attacked, but Cavour (1859-1861) was working steadily for a "United Italy," and in 1870, Victor Emmanuel, King of Italy, took possession of the Papal territory, leaving the Pope only the Vatican. An annual donation of 2,000,000 lire was guaranteed to him by the Italian parliament, but he has never accepted it. (The Syllabus, § ix. deals with "Errors concerning the Roman Pontiff's civil precedence.")

"The Popes have not ceased to declare, on all fitting occasions, that the preservation of their temporal independence is necessary, as human affairs are constituted, to the free and full exercise of their spiritual authority. It has been argued that the raison d'être of the temporal power has ceased in modern times, because the lay power has ceased to be, as it often was in the middle ages, arbitrary, corrupt, violent, and ill-informed, but on the contrary is administered on fixed and equitable principles which ensure equal justice for all."—Addis & Arnold: Cath. Dict., p. 718.

2. The power exercised by the Popes in the middle ages of excommunicating, and after excommunication deposing or procuring the deposition of a sovereign who had fallen into heresy. According to Addis & Arnold (Cath. Dict., p. 257), "The common opinion teaches that the Pope holds the power of both swords, the spiritual and the temporal, which jurisdiction and power Christ himself committed to Peter and his successors (Matt. xvi. 19). . . . The contrary opinion is held to favour of heresy." But they add (p. 258), "The state of Europe is so much altered . . . that there is no longer any question, even at Rome, of exercising the deposing power."

tēm'-pōr-āl (2), a. [Lat. tempora = the temples.]

temporal-bone, s.

Anat.: A bone articulating posteriorly and internally with the occipital bone, superiorly with the parietal, anteriorly with the sphenoid, the malar, and the inferior maxillary bone. It constitutes part of the side and base of the skull, and contains in its interior the organ of hearing. It has a squamous, a mastoid, and a petrous portion. (Quain.)

temporal-fascia, s.

Anat.: A dense, white, shining sponenrotic structure covering the temporal muscle above the zygoma, and giving attachment to some of its fibres.

temporal-fossa, s.

Anat.: The upper portion of the space bridged over by the zygomatic or malar arch.

tēm'-pō-rāl-ī-ty, tem-po-ral-ī-tie, s. [Low Lat. temporalitas, from Lat. temporalis.] [TEMPORAL, 1.]

*1. The quality or state of being temporary; opposed to perpetuity.

"Thus we distinguish the laws of peace from the orders of war; those are perpetual, to distinguish from the temporality of these."—Bishop Taylor: Rule of Conscience, bk. II, ch. 11.

*2. The laity.

"Blame not onely the clergy, but also the temporalities."—Sir T. More: Works, p. 232.

3. A secular possession; specif. in the plural, revenues of an ecclesiastical proceeding from lands, tenements, or lay fees, tithes, and the like; opposed to spiritualities.

"The King yielded up the point, reserving the ceremony of homage from the bishops, in respect of the temporalities, to himself."—Aylife: Parergon.

tēm'-pōr-āl-lý, tem-por-āl-liche, adv. [Eng. temporal (1); -ly.] In a temporal manner; with respect to time or this life; temporarily.

"To die temporally."—Ep. Taylor: Sermons, vol. II, ser. 27.

tēm'-pōr-āl-nēss, a. [Eng. temporal; -ness.] The quality or state of being temporal; worldliness.

tēm'-pōr-āl-ty, tem-por-āl-tie, tem-por-āl-tye, s. [Eng. temporal (1); -ty.]

1. The laity; secular people.

"The authority of both the states, that is to say, both of the spiritualitie and temporalitie."—Udal: Marke xiv.

2. A secular possession; a temporality.

tēm'-pōr-ā-nē-ōus, a. [Lat. temporaneus, from tempus, genit. temporis = time.] Temporary.

"Those things may cause a temporaneous diuision."—Hallywell: Motampronaa, p. 68.

tēm'-pōr-ār-ī-lý, adv. [Eng. temporary; -ly.] In a temporary manner; for a time only; not perpetually.

tēm'-pōr-ār-ī-nēss, s. [Eng. temporary; -ness.] The quality or state of being temporary.

tēm'-pōr-ār-ý, a. [Lat. temporarius, from tempus, genit. temporis = time; Fr. temporaire; Sp. & Ital. temporario.] Lasting for a time only; having limited duration or existence; made for a time or for a special occasion or purpose; not perpetual, not permanent.

"What he recommended was, not a standing, but a temporary army, an army of which Parliament would annually fix the number."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xxiii.

¶ Temporary characterizes that which is intended to last only for a time, in distinction from that which is permanent; offices depending upon a state of war are temporary, in distinction from those which are connected with internal policy: transitory, that is, apt to pass away, characterizes everything in the world which is formed only to exist for a time, and then to pass away; thus our pleasures, and our pains, and our very being, are denominated transitory: fleeting, which is derived from the verb to fly and flight, is but a stronger term to express the same idea as transitory. (Crabb.)

Astron.: A star appearing for a time, and then gradually vanishing away. In November, 1572, a star burst out in Cassiopeia with a brilliancy greater than that of any one near it, Tycho Brahe being one of those who observed it at the time. It rapidly increased in magnitude till it outshone Sirius and Jupiter, and became visible even at noon. Then it diminished in size, and in March, 1574, became invisible to the naked eye, nor has it been seen since. During its brief life it shone first white, then yellow, then reddish, and finally bluish. Other temporo stars have been observed, their sudden visibility perhaps due to an outburst and combustion or incandescence of hydrogen. [VARIABLE-STAR.]

tēm'-pōr-ist, a. [Lat. tempus, genit. temporis = time.] A temporizer. (Alarston.)

tēm'-pōr-ī-zā-tion, s. [Eng. temporis(e); -ation.] The act or habit of temporizing.

"Charges of temporization and compliances had somewhat sullied his reputation."—Johnson: Life of Ascham.

tēm'-pōr-ize, tēm'-pōr-ize, v.t. [Fr. temporiser, from Lat. tempus, genit. temporis = time.]

1. To comply with the time or occasion; to humour or yield to the current of opinion or to circumstances; to suit one's actions or conduct to the time or circumstances.

"The ways of the world (they cry) are not always consonant; . . . but we must now and then temporize, or we are nothing."—Gilpin: Hints for Sermons, vol. IV, § 8.

2. To try to suit both sides or parties; to trim.

*3. To delay; to procrastinate.

"The Earl of Lincoln, declin'd of the country's concurrence, in which case he would have temporized, resolved to give the king battle."—Bacon: Henry VII.

*4. To comply; to come to terms.

"The dauphin is too wilful opposite.
And will not temporize with my entreaties."
Shakespeare: King John, V, 2.

tēm'-pōr-iz-ēr, s. [Eng. temporis(e); -er.] One who temporizes; one who suits his actions or conduct to the time or circumstances; a trimmer.

"A hovering temporizer, that Canst with thine eyes at once see good and evil, Inclining to them both."
Shakespeare: Winter's Tale, I, 2.

2. The state of being tempted or enticed to something evil. "Lead us not into temptation."—Luke xi. 4.

3. That which tempts or entices; an enticement or allurements to some act, whether good or ill.

"Let a man be but in earnest in praying against a temptation as the tempter is in pressing it, and he needs not proceed by a surer measure."—South: Sermons, vol. vi., ser. 10.

tẽmpt-tĩ-less (p silent), a. [Eng. temptation; -less.] Having no temptation or motive.

"Which of our senses do they entortle, which of our faculties do they court, an empty, profitless, temptationless sin."—Hammond: Sermons, vol. viii., ser. 7.

tẽmpt-tĩ-tious (p silent), *temp-ta-ci-ous, a. [TEMPT.] Tempting, seductive, alluring. "I, my Illeg, I; O, that temptacious tongue." Death of Robert, Earl of Huntingdon.

tẽmpt-er (p silent), *tempt-our, s. [Eng. tempt; -er.] One who tempts; one who allures or incites to something evil.

"Destitute of the talents both of a writer and of a statesman, he had in a high degree the unavoidable qualifications of a tempter."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. v.

*The tempter: The great adversary of mankind; the devil.

tẽmpt-ĩng (p silent), pr. par. & a. [TEMPT.] A. As pr. par.: (See the verb). B. As adj.: Seductive, alluring, enticing, attractive.

"Those tempting words were all to Sappho used." Pope: Sappho to Phaon, 69.

tẽmpt-ĩng-lỹ (p silent), adv. [Eng. tempt-ĩng; -ly.] In a tempting manner; so as to tempt, entice, or allure.

"These look temptingly."—Herbert: Traveis, p. 201.

"Day at length came, and the temptress vanished." Scott: Glenivilla. (Note.)

tẽmse, tẽmpse, s. [A.S. tẽmes; Dnt. tẽma = a colander, a sieve.] A colander, a sieve.

*To set the tẽmse (or Thames) on fire: To make a figure in the world. The origin of the expression is uncertain. According to Brewer, a hard-working, active man would not unfrequently ply the tẽmse so quickly as to set fire to the wooden hoop at the bottom; but a lazy fellow would never set the tẽmse on fire. He adds that the play on the word tẽmse has given rise to many imitations; as, He will never set the Seine on fire (the French Seine also = a drag-net). Other authorities contend for the literal view. The suggestion that tẽmse should be read for Thames appeared in Notes & Queries (3rd ser., vii. 230); and, in answer to a correspondent (6th ser., xii. 360), the Editor says: "This idea, which is discussed 4th ser., vi. 32, 101, 144, 223; xii. 80, 119, 137, like other suggestions of the kind, is received with little favour, and the ordinarily accepted supposition is that it is equivalent to saying that an idle fellow will not accomplish a miracle."

tẽmse-bread, tẽmsed-bread, *tẽmse-loaf, s. Bread made of flour better sifted than common flour.

"Some miseth to miller the rhye with the wheat Tẽmse-loaf, on his table, to have for to eat." Tussor: September's Husbandry.

Ten Hours' Act, s.

Law: A popular name for the Act 10 & 11 Viet., c. 29, which limited the hours of labor for woman and children in factories. (English.)

*Ten hours has since become the established limit of labor for workmen in most industries, in the United States and England. A movement is now in progress towards the establishment of an eight hour period of labor. It has been effective in some industries, while in many others a nine hour labor day exists. This demand is still actively maintained.

ten-strike, s. [See STRIKE, s.]

Ten Tribes, s. pl.

Hist.: The kingdom of Israel as distinguished from the kingdom of Judah (1 Kings xi. 29-35, xii. 15-24). The former consisted of all the tribes except Judah and Benjamin, and these ten tribes were carried into captivity by Shalmaneser, king of Assyria (2 Kings xviii. 8-10), and from this captivity it is generally believed that there was no return. This dispersion naturally gave rise to many theories, one of the latest of which is Anglo-Israelitism, which endeavours to prove the identity of the English nation with the lost Ten Tribes, and thereby to claim for England the Biblical promises of favour of Israel. The theory was first broached by the late John Wilson, of Brighton, about 1840, in a series of lectures since published under the title of Our Israelitish Origin. The Anglo-Israelites claim that they form a body of two millions distributed over the English-speaking portions of the world, and they have a considerable literature.

"Let us take London, whose derivation is still doubtful; as a Hebrew name we shall find it to be Lan-dun, 'the dwelling of Dan.' Old London was, therefore, inhabited by the Danites (perhaps a part of them went over to Den-mark, although not yet claimed by the Danes), and the 'Danish' may have been the lepers' house connected with the Hebrew word dy (Job xvi. 15)... Could not Sydenham mean 'the home of the Bidonians'? I have many more arguments to this effect, which will appear as an appendix to my forthcoming medieval Jewish documents on the ten tribes."—A. Neubauer, in Notes & Queries, Jan. 29, 1887, p. 95.

tion to hold fast what is possessed by or committed to it.

"To resent an error deeply, to reprove it bitterly, to remember it tenaciously, to repeat it frequently."—Faylor: Sermons, vol. III, ser. 1.

2. Adhesively; with cohesive force.

tē-nā-cious-nēss, s. [Eng. tenacious; -ness.]

1. The quality or state of being tenacious of that which is possessed or committed; unwillingness to let go, resign, or quit.

"Tenaciousness even of a resolution taken for opposition acie serves either to good or bad purposes."—Search: Light of Nature, vol. I, pt. I, ch. VI.

2. That quality of bodies which enables them to adhere or stick to others; adhesiveness, tenacity.

3. That quality of bodies which enables them to resist tension or tearing asunder; tenacity, cohesive force.

tē-nāc-i-tē, *tē-nac-i-tle, s. [Fr. tenacité, from Lat. tenacitatem, accus. of tenacitas, from tenax, genit. tenacis = tenacious (q.v.).]

I. Literally:

1. The quality or state of being tenacious; that quality of bodies which makes them adhere to other substances; adhesiveness, stickiness, glutinousness.

"The slime engendered within the lake of Sodom in Juris, as viscous as it is otherwise, will forego all that tenacity."—P. Holland: Plante, bk. xviii, ch. vii.

2. That property of material bodies by which they are able to resist a severe strain without rupturing or splitting; that quality of material bodies by which their parts resist an effort to force or pull them asunder; the measure of the resistance of bodies to tearing or crushing; opposed to brittleness or fragility. Tenacity results from the attraction of cohesion existing between the particles of bodies, and is directly proportional to it. It consequently varies in different substances, and even in the same material under varying conditions as regards temperature. The resistance offered to tearing is called absolute tenacity, that offered to crushing, retroactive tenacity. The processes of forging and wire-drawing increase the tenacity of metals longitudinally, and the tenacity of mixed metals is generally greater than that of simple metals. The tenacity of wood is greater in its longitudinal direction than in a transverse direction.

"The method of ascertaining the tenacity of particular bodies is to form them into cylindrical or prismatic wires, and note the weight required to break them. It is directly proportional to the breaking weight, and inversely proportional to the area of a transverse section of the wire.

3. The quality of holding on to, or of not letting go the hold on anything.

"The tenacity of the English bulldog... was a subject for national boasting."—Lecky: England in the Eighteenth Century, vol. I, ch. IV.

"II. Fig.: Unwillingness to forget; obstinacy.

"I grieve to my griefs, that the mis-understanding tenacity of some zealous spirits hath made it a quarrell."—Bp. Hall: The Reconciler.

tēn-āc-ū-lūm, s. [Lat. = a holder, from teneo = to hold.]

Surg.: A fine hook, attached to a handle, which is thrust through a blood-vessel, to draw it out and enable it to be tied.

tenaculum-forceps, s.

Surg.: An instrument for grasping an artery, to facilitate tying. The instrument has a pair of bifurcated claws, which close into each other upon the artery by a spring.

*tēn-a-cy, s. [Low Lat. tenacia, from Lat. tenax, genit. tenacis = tenacity (q.v.).] Tenacity, tenaciousness.

"Highest excellence is void of all envy, selfishness, and tenacy."—Barnes: Sermons, vol. II, ser. xii.

tē-nāil, tē-nāille, s. [Fr. tenaille, from tenir (Lat. teneo) = to hold.]

Fort.: A low work located in the ditch and in front of a curtain to protect the curtain and flanks of the bastions. A passage for troops is left between each end and the adjacent flank.

tē-nāil-lōn (second l as y), s. [Fr., from tenaille = tenail (q.v.).]

Fort.: A low outwork having a salient angle; it was formerly usual to place one on each side of a ravelin to increase its strength and cover the shoulders of the bastion.

tēn-an-cy, *ten-an-cie, s. [Eng. tenant(-); -cy.]

1. A holding or possession of lauds or tenements from year to year, or for a term of years, for a life or lives, or at will; tenure; the temporary possession of what belongs to another.

"To this species of tenancy succeeded, though by very slow degrees, farmers, properly so called, who cultivated the land with their own stock, paying a rent certain to the landlord."—Smith: Wealth of Nations, bk. III, ch. II.

2. The period during which lands or tenements are held by one person from another.

"3. A house of habitation, or a place to live in, held of another.

¶ Tenancy in Common:

tēn-ant-ry, s. [Eng. tenant (1), a.; -ry.]

1. The body of tenants collectively.

"The tenantry, whom nobody knows, starve and rot on the dunghills whence they originated."—Arnold: Essays, No. 114.

*2. Tenancy.

tēnch, s. [O. Fr. tenche; Fr. tanche; Lat. tinca (q.v.).]

Ichthy.: Tinca tinca (or vulgaris), the sole species of the genus, found all over Europe in stagnant waters with soft bottom; it is not abundant in English rivers, but in old pits in brick-yards. Like most other Carps of the group Leuciscina, it passes the winter in a torpid state, concealed in the mud. Tench have been taken three feet long, but one of half that size is unusually large. They breed in May and June, depositing the spawn among aquatic plants; the ova are small, and exceedingly numerous, as many as 297,000 having been counted in a single female. The flesh is naturally soft and insipid, but if the fish are fed on meal, it becomes delicate and well-flavoured. The colour is usually deep yellowish-brown, and the so-called Golden Tench is not a distinct species, but a variety displaying incipient albinism.

tench-weed, s.

Bot.: The genus Potamogeton (q.v.), spec. P. natans. Forby supposes the name is given because the weed is very agreeable to the fish, but Prior because it grows in ponds "where tench have broken up the puddling by burrowing in it."

"Capt. Knight, with a freshness and three tenders, which had had not a constant crew."
Dampier: Voyages (au. 1688).

3. Domestic.: A small reservoir attached to a mop, scrubber, or similar utensil.

tënd'-dër (2), s. [TENDER (1), v.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. The act of offering for acceptance; an offer for acceptance.
"A formal tender and a formal acceptance."
Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. XII.

2. An offer in writing to do certain work, or supply certain specified articles at a certain sum or rate.
3. That which is tendered, proffered, or offered.
"You have ta'en these tenders for true pay."
Shaksp.: Hamlet, I. 2.

II. Law: An offer of money or other thing in satisfaction of a debt or liability.

¶ (1) Legal tender: Coin or paper-money which, so far as regards the nature or quality thereof, a debtor may be compelled to pay, or a creditor to receive, in settlement of debt. The legal tender money of the United States is as follows: Gold coin; silver dollars and silver certificates (except when otherwise expressly stipulated in the contract); fractional silver in amounts not exceeding ten dollars; United States notes or "greenbacks" (except for payment of duties and interest on the national debt); Treasury notes (except when otherwise expressly stipulated in the contract). Gold is, therefore, our only full and unlimited legal tender money. Notes of national banks are not legal tender, but are "receivable" for all debts and dues, public and private, except duties and interest on the national debt. Trade dollars and foreign moneys are not legal tender. The constitutional right of our government to issue legal tender paper currency in either peace or war was decided by the Supreme Court (Mr. Justice Field dissenting), on March 3, 1884, in the case of Juillard vs. Greenman, 110 U. S., 421. Our Constitution prohibits the several States from making any money legal tender except gold and silver coins. [See FIAT MONEY.]

(2) Plea of tender:

Law: A plea by a defendant that he has been always ready to satisfy the plaintiff's claim, and now brings the sum demanded into court.

(3) Tender of amends:

Law: An offer by a person who has been guilty of any wrong or breach of contract to pay a sum of money by way of amends.

* tënd'-dër (1), v.t. & i. [Fr. tendre, from Lat. tendo = to stretch, to direct, to extend. Tender and tend (2) are thus doublets.]

A. Transitive:

3. Full of tendons; sinewy.

těnd-měnt, s. [Eng. tend (1), v.; -ment.] The act of tending; attendance, care.

"Whether ill tendment or recrelesse paine Procure his death, the neighbours all complaine."
Sp. Hall: Satire, ll. 4.

těn-dō, s. [TENDON.] A tendon.

tendo-Achillis, s. [ACHILLIS-TENDO.]

těn-dón, s. [Fr., from an Imaginary Low Lat. tendo, from Lat. tendo = to stretch.]

Anat. (Pl.): Cords of tough, white, shining fibrous tissue, connecting the ligaments with the bones.

tendon-phenomena, s. pl.

Physiol.: The action of certain muscles, due apparently to reflex action produced by afferent impulses started in the tendon, but really to direct stimulation of the muscles themselves. Thus, when the leg is placed in an easy position (for example, resting upon the other leg), a sharp blow on the patellar tendon will cause a sudden jerk forward of the leg, produced by the contraction of the quadriceps femoris muscle.

těn-dō-tōme, s. [Eng. tendon], and Gr. τομή (tomē) = a cutting.]

Surg.: A subcutaneous knife, having a small oblong blade on the end of a long stem, and used for severing deep-seated tendons without making a large incision or dissecting down to the spot.

těn-drác, s. [Native name.]

Zool.: A small insectivorous mammal, from Madagascar, allied to the Tenrec, but separated on account of its dentition, and given generic rank under the name Ericulus. It is about two-thirds of the size of the Common Hedgehog, which it closely resembles in appearance. Its general tint is dusky, the spines being black, tipped with white or light red. Telfair's Tenrac, with the same habit, constitutes another genus, Echinops, differing from Ericulus in dentition. It is about five inches long, brownish above, dingy white beneath, the upper surface closely covered with sharp spines. [RICE-TENDRAC.]

TENDRAC.

těn-dril, *těn-drěll, s. & a. [Shortened from Fr. tendrillons = tendrils; O. Fr. tendron = a tender fellow, a tendril, from tendre = tender (q.v.); cf. Ital. tenerume = cartilages, tendrils, from tenero = tender.]

A. As substantive:

1. Bot. & Lit.: A curling and twining thread-like process by which one plant clings to another body for the purpose of support. It may be a modification of the midrib, as in the pea; a prolongation of a leaf, as in Nepenthes; or a modification of the inflorescence, as in the vine. They have been divided into stem-tendrils and leaf-tendrils. Called also Cirrhus, and by the old authors Capreolus and Clavicula. Linnaeus included tendrils under his fulcra. Tendril-bearing plants are distributed among ten orders.

"As the vine curls her tendrils"
Milton: P. L., iv. 307.

¶ Darwin (Origin of Species, ch. vii.) points out that the gradations from leaf-climbers to tendril-bearers are wonderfully close, and that in each case the change is beneficial to the species in a high degree.

2. Fig.: Anything curling or spiral like a tendril.

"The glossy tendrils of his raven hair."
Byron: Lara, ll. 21.

B. As adj.: Clasping or climbing like a tendril; having tendrils.

"Mingled with the curling growth Of tendrils hops, that flaunt upon their poles."
Dyer: Fleecy, l.

těn-driled, těn-drilled, a. [Eng. tendril; -ed.]

Bot., &c.: Furnished with tendrils.

"Round their trunks the thousand-tendrilled vine wound up."
Southey: Thalaba, bk. vi.

těn-drón, s. [O. Fr.] A tendril.

"Buds and tendrils appear above ground."—P. Holland: Pinte, bk. xix., ch. viii.

těn-drý, s. [Eng. tender (1), v.; -y.] Tender, offer.

těnd-sóme, a. [Eng. tend (1), v.; -some.] Needing much care and attention: as, a tend-some child. (Prov.)

těne, s. & v. [TEEN.]

těn-ě-brěe, s. pl. [Lat. = darkness.]

Eccles.: The office of Matins and Lauds for the Thursday, Friday, and Saturday in Holy Week (q.v.), sung on the afternoon or evening of Wednesday, Thursday, and Friday respectively. The Gloria Patri, hymns, antiphons of the Blessed Virgin, &c., are omitted in token of sorrow. At the beginning of the office, fifteen lighted candles are placed on a triangular stand, and at the conclusion of each psalm one is put out, till a single candle is left at the top of the triangle. While the Benedictus is being sung, the lights on the high altar are extinguished, and then the single candle is hidden at the Epistle side, to be brought out at the conclusion of the office. The extinction of the lights (whence the name tenebræ) is said to figure the growing darkness of the world at the time of the Crucifixion, and the last candle is hidden for a time to signify that death could not really obtain dominion over Christ, though it appeared to do so. A noise is made at the conclusion of the office to symbolize the convulsions of nature at the death of Christ (Matt. xxvii. 45, 50-53; Mark xv. 33, 37, 38; Luke xxiii. 44, 45).

tě-ně-brý-cóse, a. [Lat. tenebricosus, from tenebræ = darkness.] Tenebrous, dark, gloomy.

těn-ě-brif-íc, a. [Lat. tenebræ = darkness, and facio = to make.] Causing or producing darkness; darkening.

"Where light Lay fitful in a tenebrific time."
Browning: King & Book, x. 1761.

těn-ě-brif-íc-ous, a. [TENEBRIFIC.] Causing or producing darkness; tenebrific.

tě-ně-brý-ō, s. [Lat. = one who shuns the light, from tenebræ = darkness.]

Entom.: The typical genus of Tenebrionidae (q.v.). Tenebrio molitor is the Mealworm (q.v.).

tě-ně-brý-ón-ý-dě, s. & pl. [Med. Lat. tenebrio, genit. tenebrion(is); fem. pl. adj. suff. -ide.]

Entom.: A family of Heterometrous Beetles, tribe Atrachelina. Body usually oval or oblong, depressed; thorax square or trapezoid, the same breadth as the extremity of the abdomen; last joint of the maxillary palpi formed like a reversed triangle or hatchet; mentum but little extended, leaving the base of the jaws uncovered. Black or dull-coloured insects, with a peculiar odour, slow in their movements and nocturnal in their habits. A few aberrant species are found on trees and plants. They feed generally on decaying animal and vegetable matter. Most of the hard species are very tenacious of life. Some are mimetic, resembling Carabidae, Longicornes, &c. About 5,000 species are known. The larger number are found along the margins of deserts in the Old and New World; the species being very numerous in such localities.

tě-ně-brý-ous, a. [Lat. tenebræ = darkness.] Dark, gloomy, tenebrous; pertaining to night.

"Were moon and stars for villains only made,
To guide, yet across them, with tenebrous light"
Young: Night Thoughts, ix. 966.

těn-ě-bróse, a. [Lat. tenebrosus.] Dark, tenebrous.

Těn-ě-bró-sí, s. pl. [Ital.] [TENEBOSE.]

Art.: A name applied to a school of artists, also called Caravaggeschi, after its founder, Caravaggio. The remarkable characteristic of this class of artist was their bold and powerful rendering of chiaroscuro.

těn-ě-brós-ý-tý, s. [O. Fr. tenebrosité.] The quality or state of being tenebrous; darkness, gloom, gloominess.

"Tenebrosity or darkness is directly opposite to light and clearness."—P. Holland: Plutarck, p. 552.

těn-ě-bróus, a. [Lat. tenebrosus, from tenebræ = darkness.] Dark, gloomy.

"The towering and tenebrous boughs of the cypress."
Longfellow: Evangeline, ll. 2.

těn-ě-bróus-něss, s. [Eng. tenebrous; -ness.] The quality or state of being tenebrous; darkness, gloom.

těn-ě-měnt, s. [Fr., from Low Lat. tenementum, from Lat. teneo = to hold.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. An abode, a habitation, a dwelling, a house. (Lit. & fig.)

"Can all saint, sage, or sophist ever write, People this lonely tower, this tenement rent?"
Byron: Childe Harold, ll. 6.

2. An apartment, or set of apartments, in a building, used by one family; an apartment, or set of apartments, in an inferior building used by a poor family.

II. Law: Any species of permanent property that may be held, as lands, houses, an advowson, a franchise, a peerage, &c.

"Tenement is a word of still greater extent (than land) and though in its vulgar acceptation it is only applied to houses and other buildings, yet in its original, proper, and legal sense, it signifies every thing that may be held, provided it be of a permanent nature: whether it be of a substantial and sensible, or of an unsubstantial ideal kind."—Blackstone: Comment, bk. ii., ch. 2.

tenement-house, s. A house divided into tenements occupied by separate families. In tenement houses the landlord does not reside on the premises. [TENEMENT, 1. 2.]

těn-ě-měnt-ál, a. [Eng. tenement; -al.] Pertaining to a tenement, or tenements; capable of being held by a tenant.

"The other, or tenemental lands, they distributed among their tenants."—Blackstone: Comment, bk. ii., ch. 2.

těn-ě-měnt-ar-ý, a. [Eng. tenement; -ary.] Capable of being leased; designed for tenancy; held by tenants.

"Such were the Ceorls among the Saxons; but of two sorts, one that hired the lord's outland or tenementary land (called also the Folcland) like our farmers."—Speiman: Of Feuds & Tenures, ch. vii.

tě-ně-n-dās, s. [Lat., accus. fem. pl. of tenendus, fut. pass. par. of teneo = to hold.]

Scots Law: That clause of a charter by which the particular tenure is expressed.

tě-ně-n-dum, s. [Lat., neut. sing. of tenendus, fut. pass. par. of teneo = to hold.]

Law: That clause in a deed wherein the tenure of the land is created and limited. Its office is to limit and appoint the tenure of the land which is held, and how and of whom it is to be held.

těn-ěnt, s. [Lat. 3rd pers. pl. pr. indic. of teneo = to hold.] A tenet (q.v.).

Hardness, 3.5 to 4; sp. gr. 4.37 to 4.53; lustre, metallic, becoming very dull on long exposure to light; colour, blackish gray to iron-black; streak, dark gray. Compos.: a sulpharsenite of copper and iron, with the formula 4(Cu,Fe)₃ + As₂S₃. The finest crystals have hitherto been found in the mines of Cornwall.

tēn-nē, s. [Fr. tenné.] [TAWNY.]

Her.: A colour, a kind of chestnut or orange-brown colour. It is seldom used in coat-armour. In engraving it is represented by diagonal lines, drawn from the sinister chief point, and traversed by horizontal ones.

tēn-nēr, s. [Eng. ten; -er.] A ten-pound note. (Slang.)

tēn-nīs, *ten-eis, *ten-nes, *ten-nys, *ten-ys, *ten-yso, s. [Etym. doubtful.]

Skeat proposes O. Fr. tenies, pl. of tenis = a fillet, headband (Lat. tenia), in allusion to the string over which the balls are played, or to the streak on the wall as in rackets. Others prefer Fr. tenes = take this, 2nd pers. pl. imperative of tenir = to hold.] A game of ball played in a court by two or four persons. The court is divided by a net, about three feet high, called the "line," and the game consists in driving a ball against the wall, and causing it to rebound beyond the line, by striking it with a small bat, known as a racket, the object being to keep the ball in motion as long as possible, he who first allows it to fall to the ground losing the stroke. Tennis was introduced into England in the thirteenth century, and was very popular down to the reign of Charles II. Since then it has become almost extinct in England, owing to the expense of providing the complicated court.

Lawn-tennis (q.v.), which is a modified form of tennis, was introduced into England in 1873, and is now very popular in the United States.

"His easy bow, his good stories, his style of dancing and playing tennis, the sound of his cordial laugh, were familiar to all London."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xl.

tennis-ball, s. The ball used in the game of tennis. (Shakesp.: Much Ado, iii. 2.)

tennis-court, s. A court or alley in which tennis is played. (Shakesp.: 2 Henry IV., ii. 2.)

tēn-nīs, v.t. [TENNIS, s.] To drive backwards and forwards, as a ball in the game of tennis.

"Those four parsons issuing forth upon the enemy, will so drive him from one side to another, and tennis him amongst them, that he shall find no where safe to keep his feet in, nor hide himself."—Spenser: On Ireland.

tēn-ōn, *ten-oun, *ten-non, *ten-own, *ten-ant, *ten-ent, s. [Fr. tenon, from tenir; Lat. teneo = to hold.]

Corp.: The projecting end of a piece of timber fitted for insertion into a mortise, formed by cutting away a portion on one or more sides; sometimes made cylindrical. The usual joint in putting up wooden frames, whether of buildings or machines. Tenons are secured in their mortises by pins, or by giving them a dovetail, which is driven into the undercut mortise by means of a wedge or backing-block.

TENON.

"A mortise and tenon, or ball-and-socket joint, is wanted at the hip."—Paley: Nat. Theol., ch. viii.

tenon-auger, s. A hollow auger used for turning the ends of movable blind-slits down to a round tenon. The end of the tenon is afterwards dressed by a bur.

tenon-saw, s. A thin saw with a thicker metallic backing; used for fine work, such as sawing tenons, dovetails, mitres for joints, &c.

tēn-ōn, v.t. [TENON, s.]

I. Literally:

1. To fit for insertion into a mortise, as the end of a piece of timber.

tēn-ōr, *tēn-ōur, *ten-oure, s. & a. [Fr. teneur = the tenor part in music, tenor, substance, from Lat. tenorem, accus. of tenor = a holding on, tenor, sense; teneo = to hold; Sp. tenor; Ital. tenore.]

A. As substantive:

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Continued run or course; general or prevailing direction; mode of continuance.
 "So shall my days in one sad tenor run."
Pope: Homer; Iliad vi. 32a.

2. The course or line of thought which runs or holds through the whole of a discourse; general course, direction, or drift of thought; general spirit, meaning, or tendency; purport, substance.

"The whole tenor of the gospels and epistles shows, that human virtues are all light in the balance."—Waterland: Works, v. 473.

3. Stamp, character, nature, kind.

"All of a tenour was their after-life."
Dryden: Palamon & Arcite, iii. 114a.

II. Technically:

1. Law: A transcript or copy. It implies that a correct copy is set out, and therefore the instrument must be set out correctly, even although the pleader may not have set out more than the substance or purport of the instrument.

2. Music:

(1) The third of the four kinds of voices arranged with regard to their compass. It is the highest of male chest voices, and its extent lies between tenor c and treble a. The tenor voice is sometimes called by way of distinction "the human voice," from an idea that it is the quality and compass of voice most common to man. The Plain Song of the Church was formerly given as a tenor part, the harmonies being constructed above and below it. The name is derived from the holding or sustaining note which was given formerly to this voice. In old music the tenor voice was divided into three classes, high, mean, and low tenor.

(2) The third of the four parts in which concerted or harmonized music for mixed voices is usually composed; the part above the bass. Formerly the music for this part was written on a staff marked with the tenor clef; but now it is generally written in displaced or full-score music on the staff marked with the treble clef, and is sung an octave lower. In compressed and short-score music it is written on the bass staff and its supplementary upper ledger-lines.

(3) One who possesses a tenor voice; one who sings a tenor part.

(4) An instrument which plays a tenor part.

(5) The larger violin of low pitch is called the tenor, alto viola, bratscha, and sometimes alto violin.

(6) A tenor bell (q.v.).

B. As adjective:
Music: Pertaining to the tenor; adapted for playing or singing the tenor part: as, a tenor voice, a tenor instrument.

tenor bell, s. The principal bell in a peal or set.

tenor C, s.

Music:
 1. The lowest c in the tenor voice.
 2. The lowest string of the tenor violin.

tenor-clef, s.

Music: The c clef placed upon the fourth line of the staff. It is used for the tenor voice, tenor trombone, the higher register of the bassoon and violoncello, &c. The treble clef is sometimes employed for the tenor voice, but the notes are then expressed an octave above their true sound.

tenor-trombone, s.

Music: A trombone with a compass of two octaves and a fifth.

tēn-ōr, s. [A corruption of the (q.v.).]

tēn-ōr-ē, s. [Ital.]

Music:

1. A tenor voice.

2. A tenor singer.

¶ Tenore duffo, a tenor singer to whom is assigned a comic part in an opera; Tenore leggiero, a tenor singer with a voice of light, small quality; Tenore robusto, a tenor singer with a full, strong, sonorous voice.

tēn-ō-rī-nō, s. [Ital., dimin. of tenore = tenor.] A tenor singer having a voice of a light, clear, thin quality.

tēn-ōr-ist, s. [Eng. tenor; -ist.]

Music: One who sings the tenor part or plays the tenor violin. (Stainer & Barrett.)

tēn-ōr-ite, s. [After the Neapolitan savant, Tenore; suff. -ite (Min.).]

Min.: A variety of melacnite (q.v.), occurring in very thin crystalline scales of a shining black colour on volcanic scoria at Vesuvius. Lately shown, on optical grounds, to be triclinic in crystallization.

tēn-ōr-ōon, s. [TENOR.]

Music:

1. The name of an old tenor oboe with a compass extending downwards to tenor c.

2. A word affixed to an organ stop to denote that it does not proceed below tenor c: as, tenoroon hautboy. A tenoroon diapason is a double diapason which does not extend below tenor c.

tēn-ō-tōme, s. [TENDOTOME.]

tēn-ōt-ō-mŷ, *tēn-ōn-tōt-ō-mŷ, s. [Gr. tenōn (tenōn), genit. tenōros (tenontos) = a tenon, and τομή (tomē) = a cutting.]

Surg.: The act of dividing a tendon; the division of a tendon.

tēn-pen-nŷ, a. [Eng. ten, and penny.] Valued at or worth tenpence.

tense, tence, s. [O. Fr. tens; Fr. tense = time, season, from Lat. tempus = time, a tense; Port. & Ital. tempo; Sp. tiempo.]

Gram.: One of the forms which a verb takes in order to express time of action or of that which is affirmed; one of the particular forms of inflection of a verb by which time of action is expressed. The primary simple tenses are three: past, present, and future; but these admit of many modifications, which differ in different languages. In English tenses are formed: (1) by internal vowel change, as in sing, sang, fling, flung, &c.; (2) by terminal inflection, as in love, loved, live, lived, &c.; or (3) by the use of auxiliary verbs, as love, did love, will love; go, will go, had gone, &c.

"The tenses are used to mark present, past, and future time, either indefinitely without reference to any beginning, middle, or end; or else definitely, in reference to such distinctions."—Harris: Grammar, bk. 1, ch. vii.

tense-ly, adv. [Eng. tense, a.; -ly.] In a tense manner; tightly; with tension.

tense-ness, a. [Eng. tense, a.; -ness.] The quality or state of being tense or stretched to stiffness; stiffness, tension.

"Should the pain and tenderness of the part continue, the operation must take place."—Sharp: Surgery.

tén-sí-bil'-i-ty, s. [Eng. tensible; -ity.] The quality or state of being tensible or tensile; tensility.

tén-sí-ble, a. [Eng. tens(e), a.; -ible.] Capable of being extended; tensile.

"Gold is the closest and therefore the heaviest of metals, and is likewise the most flexible and tensible."—Bacon: Nat. Hist., § 327.

tén-sí-le, a. [Lat. tensus = tense (q.v.).] 1. Of or pertaining to tension; as, tensile strength.

2. Capable of being extended or drawn out in length or breadth.

"All bodies ductile and tensile, as metals that will be drawn into wires, have the appetite of not discontinuing."—Bacon: Nat. Hist., § 845.

tensile-strength, s. The cohesive power by which a material resists an attempt to pull it apart in the direction of its fibres. This bears no relation to its capacity for resisting compression.

tén-sí-éd, a. [Eng. tensile(e); -ed.] Rendered capable of tension; made tensile.

tén-sí-l'-i-ty, s. [Eng. tensile(e); -ity.] The quality or state of being tensile.

"The liberation or reciprocation of the spirits is the tensility of the muscles would not be so perpetual."—More: Immort. of the Soul, bk. ii, ch. 2.

tén-sí-on, s. [Fr., from Lat. tensionem, accus. of tensio = a stretching, from tensus, pa. par. of tendo = to stretch; Sp. tension; Ital. tensione.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Literally:

(1) The act of stretching or straining.

"It can have nothing of vocal sound, voice being raised by a stiff tension of the larynx."—Holder.

(2) The state of being stretched or strained to stiffness; the state of being bent or strained.

"The string which is constantly kept to a state of tension will vibrate on the slightest impulse."—Knox: Essays, No. 21.

2. Fig.: Mental strain, stretch, or application; strong or severe intellectual effort or exertion; strong excitement of feeling; great activity or strain of the emotions or will.

II. Technically:

1. Elect.: Electro-motive force. It is measured by the electrometer.

2. Mech.: The strain or the force by which a bar, rod, or string is pulled when forming part of a system in equilibrium or in motion. Thus, when a cord supports a weight, the tension at every part of the string is equal to that weight.

3. Pneum.: The expansibility or elastic force of gaseous bodies, whence gases are sometimes called elastic fluids.

4. Sewing-mach.: A pressure upon the thread to prevent its running too easily from the spool.

tension-bridge, s. A bridge constructed on the principle of the bow, the arch supporting the track by means of tension-rods, and the string acting as a tie.

tension-rod, s. A stay or tie-rod in a truss or structure, which connects opposite parts and prevents their spreading asunder.

tension-spring, s. A spring for wag-gons, railway-carriages, &c.

tén-sí-éd, a. [Eng. tension; -ed.] Sub-jected to tension or drawing out; in a state of tension; tenae, drawn out, extended.

tén-són, s. [TENZON.]

tén-sór, s. [Lat. tensus, pa. par. of tendo = to stretch.]

Anat.: Any muscle which stretches the part on which it specially operates: as, the tensor palati, the tensor tarsi, &c.

tén-sú-re (s as sh), s. [Eng. tens(e); -ure.] Tension; the act of stretching; the state of being stretched.

"This motion upon pressure, and the reciprocal thereof, motion upon tension, we call medicine of liberty, which is, when any body being forced to a preternatural extent restoreth itself to the natural."—Bacon.

tént (1), tēnte, s. [Fr. tente, from Low Lat. tenta = a tent, prop. fem. sing. of tentus, pa. par. of tendo = to stretch; Sp. tienda; Port. & Ital. tenda; Lat. tentorium.]

1. A portable pavilion or lodge, consisting of some flexible material, such as skins, matting, canvas, or other strong textile fabric, stretched over and supported on poles. Among uncivilized and wandering tribes tents have been the ordinary dwelling-places from the earliest times, but among civilized nations they are principally used as temporary lodgings for soldiers when engaged in the field, for travellers on an expedition, or for providing accommodation, refreshment, &c., for large bodies of people collected together out of doors on some special occasion, as at horse-races, fairs, cricket-matches, or the like. Military tents are made of canvas, supported by one or more poles, and distended by means of ropes fastened to pegs driven into the ground. Tents of a large size, such as are used for out-of-door fêtes are known as marquees.

"Now man the next, receding toward the main, Wedged in ooe body, at the tents they stand."—Pope: Homage; Iliad xv, 728.

2. An apparatus used in field-photography; a substitute for the usual dark room. It consists of a box provided with a yellow glass window in front, and furnished with drapery at the back, so as to cover the operator and prevent access of light to the interior. It is usually provided with shelves and racks inside, developing-tray, and a vessel of water overhead, having an elastic tube passing to the inside, to convey water for washing the plate.

3. A kind of pulpit of wood erected out-of-doors, in which clergymen used to preach when the people were too numerous to be accommodated within-doors. (Still sometimes used.) (Scotch.)

1. Eccles.: The tenth part of the annual profit of every church living in England, formerly paid to the pope, but by statute transferred to the crown, and afterwards made a part of the fund known as Queen Anne's Bontty. (Eng.)

2. Law: (See extract.)

"Tenths and fifteenths were temporary aids levied out of personal property, and were formerly the real tenth or fiftieth part of all the movables belonging to the subject. Originally the amount was uncertain, but was reduced to a certainty in the eighth year of Edward III., when new taxations were made of every township, borough, and city in the kingdom, and recorded in the Exchequer. So that when afterwards, the commons granted the crown a fifteenth, every parish in England immediately knew their proportion of it."—Blackstone: Comment., bk. 1, ch. 7.

3. Music:

(1) A compound interval, comprising an octave and a third, nine conjoint degrees, or ten sounds. The tenth is the octave of the third, and may be major or minor, diminished or augmented.

(2) An organ stop, tuned a tenth above the diapasons, called also double tierce or decima.

těnth-lĩ, adv. [Eng. tenth; -ly.] In the tenth place.

těnth-rě-din'-ĩ-dæ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. tenthred(o), genit. tenthredin(is); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -idæ.]

Entom.: Sawflies; a family of Hymenoptera, tribe Phyllophaga. The ovipositor is a saw-like blade of two lateral pieces at the apical end of the abdomen. Antennæ generally short, with three to thirty joints, sometimes pectinated in the males. Maxillary palpi with six joints; prothorax produced at the sides to the origin of the four wings; anterior tibiae with two spurs at the apex. The males are generally darker in colour than the females. The female, by the saw of the ovipositor, makes slits in the leaves or tender shoots of plants, and then separating the two pieces, deposits her eggs between them. The larvae are like those of the Lepidoptera, but want the circles of hooked bristles, and have only a simple eye on each side of the forehead. The cocoon is of the texture of parchment, or may resemble lattice, or both characteristics may be present. It is attached to the plant or tree on which the larve feed or is buried in the ground. About a thousand species are known, many of them from Europe. The larvae are very destructive to crops. [ATHALIA.]

těnth-rě-dō, s. [Gr. τενθροδών (tenthrēdōn) = a kind of wasp or fly.]

Entom.: Sawfly, the typical genus of Tenthrinidae. Upper wings with four submarginal cells; antennæ with the third and fourth joints of the same length. Tentredo cœphis, a small black species, deposits eggs on cherry and other fruit trees. The larvae are black, and often numerous enough to do the trees great damage. Tentredo grossulariæ is the Gooseberry Sawfly.

těnt'-ic, a. [Eng. tent (2), s.; -it = -y.] Heedful, cautious. (Scott.)

"Jean slips in twe with tentie e'e." Burns: Halloween.

*těnt-tĩg'-ĩn-ōus, a. [Lat. tintigo, genit. tintiginis = a stretching, lasciviousness.]

1. Stiff, stretched.

2. Lustful, lecherous.

"Nothing affects the head so much as a tentiginous humour, repelled and elated to the upper region."—Swift: Mechanical Operations of the Spirit.

těnt'-lěss, a. [Eng. tent (2), s.; -less.] Heedless, careless. (Scott.)

"I'll wander on, with careless heed." Burns: To James Smith.

těn-tōr'-ĩ-ũm, s. [Lat. = a tent (q.v.).]

Anat.: An arched or vaulted partition, stretched across the cerebrum and the cerebellum.

*těnt'-ěr-ỹ, s. [Lat. tentorium = a tent.] The textile fabric of a tent.

"The woman who are said to weave hangings and curtains for the grove, were no other than makers of tentories, to spread from tree to tree."—Evelyn: Sylva, bk. iv, § 8.

*těnt'-ure, s. [Fr.] [TENTER, s.] Paper-hangings, wall-paper.

těnt'-wōrt, s. [First element doubtful; Britten & Holland quote a statement by Threikeld that the plant was named because it was a specific against the "taint" or swelling of the joints in rickets.]

Bot.: Asplenium Ruta muraria.

*těnt-ũ-ate, v. t. [Lat. tenuatus, pa. par. of tenuo = to make thin; tenuis = thin.] To make thin.

těnt-ũ-ēs, s. pl. [Lat., pl. of tenuis = thin.]

Gram.: A term applied to the letters κ, π, τ (k, p, t) of the Greek alphabet, in relation to their respective middle letters γ, β, δ (g, b, d), and their aspirates χ, φ, θ (ch, ph, th). These terms are also applied to the corresponding letters and articulate elements in any language.

těnt-ũ-ĩ-řō-lĩ-ōus, a. [Lat. tenuis = thin, and folium = a leaf.]

Bot.: Having thin or narrow leaves.

těnt-ũ-ĩ-ōus, a. [Lat. tenuis = thin.] Rare or subtle; tenuous. (Opposed to dens.)

"The most tenuous, pure, and simple matter."—Glennil: Pre-existence of Souls, ch. xiv.

†těnt-ũ-ĩ-rōs-těr, s. [TENUIROSTRES.]

Zool.: Any individual member of the group Tenuirostres (q.v.).

†těnt-ũ-ĩ-rōs-tral, a. [TENUIROSTRES.] Of or pertaining to the Tenuirostres; slender-beaked.

"The grallatorial or tenuirostral type is shown in birds, as in quadrupeds, by a great slenderness and elongation of the jaws, muzzle, or bill."—Swainson: Birds, l. 10.

†těnt-ũ-ĩ-rōs-trēs, s. pl. [Lat. tenuis = thin, slender, and rostrum = a beak.]

Ornith.: A division of Insectores, having a long and slender beak tapering to a point. Toes large and slender, especially the hind one, the outer usually more or less united to the middle one at the base. They live on juices of plants or on insects. Families Certhiidae, Meliphagiidae, Trochilidae, Promeropidae, and Uppidae.

těnt-ũ-ĩs, s. [Lat. = thin.]

Gram.: One of the tennes (q.v.).

těnt-ũ-ĩ-tỹ, *ten-ũ-i-tie, s. [Fr. tenuité, from Lat. tenuitatem, accus. of tenuitas, from tenuis = thin.]

1. The quality or state of being tenuous or thin; thinness, slenderness; smallness in diameter.

"In the iris of the eye, and the drum of the ear, the tenuity of the muscles is astonishing."—Paley: Natural Theology, ch. ix.

2. Rarity, rareness, thinness, as of a fluid; as, the tenuity of the atmosphere.

*3. Simplicity, plainness; absence of grandeur; meanness.

*4. Poverty.

"The tenuity and contempt of clergyment will soon let them see what a poor carcass they are, when parted from the influence of that supremacy."—King Charles: Eikon Basilike.

těnt-ũ-ōus, a. [Lat. tenuis = thin, slender.]

1. Thin, small, slender, minute.

2. Rare, rarefied; subtle, not dense.

těnt'-ũre, s. [Fr., from Low Lat. tenura, from Lat. teno = to hold.]

1. The act, manner, or right of holding property, especially real estate. Land may be held according to two main principles, feudal or allodial (see these words). The former is the principle universal in England. The ancient English tenures are to be accounted for upon feudal principles, and no other; being fruits of, and deduced from, the feudal policy. For there seem to have subsisted among our ancestors four principal species of lay tenures, to which all others may be reduced, the grand criteria of which were due to the nature of the several services that were due to the lords from their tenants. These services, in respect of their quality, were either free or base services; in respect of their quantity and the time of their exacting them, were either certain or uncertain. Free services were such as were not unbecoming the character of a soldier or a freeman to perform; as, to serve under his lord in the wars, to pay a sum of money, and the like. Base services were such as were fit only for peasants or persons of a servile rank; as, to plough the lord's land, to make his hedges, or other mean employments. By later statutes the former complication of tenure has been reduced and land title made uniform, but the feudal principle persists, and all land is considered to be held mediately or immediately from the King. In the United States land is held under allodial or independent tenure, and the title of every tenant is fee-simple is absolute, and subject to the claim of no superior. In legal technicality, however, the English terms for tenure are retained. [BURGESS, COPYHOLD, FEUDALISM, SOCAGE, VILLAGAGE.]

"The tenure described by our ancient writers, under the name of privileged villanage, is such as has been held of the king of England from the Conquest downwards; being no other than an exalted species of copyhold, subsisting at this day, viz. the tenure in ancient demesne. It applies to those lands or manors, which, though now perhaps granted out to private subjects, were actually in the hands of the crown in the time of Edward the Confessor, or William the Conqueror; and the tenants therein have some peculiar privilege, now of little if of any value. It thus appears, that whatever changes and alterations our tenures have in process of time undergone, from the Norman era to the 12 Car. II., all my tenures are now in effect reduced to two species, free tenure in common socage, and base tenure by copy of court-roll."—Blackstone: Comment., bk. II, ch. 4.

2. The consideration, condition, or service, which the occupier of land gives to his lord or superior for the use of his land.

3. Manner of holding in general; the terms or conditions upon which anything is held or retained.

"All that seems this own Held by the tenure of his will alone."
Cooper: Expostulation, 67a.

tē-nū-tō, a. [Ital. = held.]

Music: A term applied to a note or series of notes having to be held or kept sounding the full time.

tēn-zōn, tēn-sōn, s. [Fr. tenzon; Ital. tenzone; from Low Lat. tenzionem, accus. of tenzio = a contending, a contest, from Lat. tenso, pa. par. of tendo = to stretch.] A contention in verse between rival troubadours before a tribunal of love or gallantry; hence, a subdivision of a chanson composed by one of the contestants or competitors.

tē-ō-cāl-lī, s. [Mex. = God's house.]

Antiq.: The name given to the temples of the aborigines of Mexico. They were built in the form of a four-sided pyramid, in two, three, or more stories, or terraces, on the highest of which the temple proper was situated. The Teocallis of Yucatan are not built in terraces, but rise at an angle of 45° to the platforms on which the temple is placed. [PYRAMID, 2.]

"A spacious and imposing building, erected on the ruins of the great teocalli, or temple of the Aztec god, Mictli."—Chambers' Encyc., vi. 436.

tē-ō-pān, s. [Mex. = place of God.] The same as TEOCALLI (q.v.).

tē-pal, s. [Altered from petal, and with a reference to sepal.]

Botany:

1. A petal.

2. One of the portions of a perianth.

tēp-ē-fac-tion, *tēp-i-fac-tion, s. [Lat. tepefactus, pa. par. of tepefacio = to tepidify (q.v.).] The act or operation of warming or making tepid or moderately warm.

tēp-ē-fy, *tēp-i-fy, v.t. & t. [Lat. tepefacio, from tepeo = to be warm, and facio = to make.]

A. Trans.: To make tepid or moderately warm.

"They [pike] lie close to the bottom, where the water is most warm, and seldom venture out, except the day be particularly fine, and the shadows at the edges of the stream become tepidified by the powerful rays of the sun."—Goldsmith: Animated Nature, iv. 283.

B. Intrans.: To become tepid or moderately warm.

tē-pē-jī-lō-tē (J as h), s. [Nativa name in Central America.]

Bot.: The young, unexpanded flower-buds of a species of Chamaedorea (q.v.); highly esteemed as a vegetable.

tēph-rē-ōps, s. [Gr. τέφρα (tephra) = ashes, and ὤψ (ōps) = the face, the countenance.]

Ichthy.: A genus of Sparidae, group Cantharina, from Chinese, Japanese, and Australian seas.

*tēph-ra-mān-cy, s. [Gr. τέφρα (tephra) = ashes, and μαντεία (mantia) = prophecy, divination.] Divination by the inspection of the ashes of a sacrifice.

tēph-rīno, tēph-rīte, s. [Gr. τέφρα (tephra) = cinders, ashes; suff. -ine, -ite.]

Petrol.: A name originally given to a gray, ash-like rock of loose texture, the base of which was trachytic. Subsequent investigation has shown, however, that it consists of a plagioclase felspar, associated with either nepheline or leucite, and sometimes with both, and also several accessory minerals. This name has been until recently used by French geologists; but Rosenbusch (Mikroskopische Physiographie d. massigen Gesteine, Stuttgart, 1877) has adopted it as a designation of a "family" of rocks, most of which are equivalent to the phonolites (q.v.).

tēph-rī-tis, s. [Mod. Lat., from Gr. τέφρα (tephra) = ashes.]

Ichthy.: A genus of Pleuronectidae (q.v.), allied to Hippoglossus. The mouth is nearly symmetrical, and the dorsal commences above the eye.

tēph-rō-or-nis, s. [Gr. τεφρόδης (tephrōdēs) = ash-coloured, and ὄρνις (ornis) = a bird. Named from their sombre plumage.]

Ornith.: A genus of Prionocidae (in some classifications, of Lanidae, when they are placed in the sub-family Dicrurinae), with four species, from the Oriental region. The frontal feathers are bristly and incurved. They go about in small flocks, carefully hunting for the insects on which they feed.

*tēph-rō-mān-cy, *tēph-rō-mān-ti-a (ti as shī), s. [TEPHRAMANCY.]

tēph-rō-ḡi-a, s. [Mod. Lat., from Gr. τεφρός (tephros) = ash-coloured.]

I. Bot.: A genus of Galeaeae. Tropical or sub-tropical trees, shrubs, or herbs, usually with unequally pinnated leaves, covered with a gray silky down, and lanceolate or subulate stipules. Flowers mostly in axillary racemes, white or purplish; calyx campanulate, with five nearly equal teeth; stamens in one or two bundles; legume linear, compressed, straight, or curved, many-seeded. The young branches of Tephrosia toxicaria and T. cinerea, West Indian plants, with the leaves pounded and sometimes mixed with quacklime, are thrown into pools and mountain streams to poison fish. The smaller fry die; the larger fishes, though temporarily stupefied, generally recover. An infusion of the seeds of T. purpurea, a copiously branched perennial, one or two feet high, common in India, is given as a cooling medicine. A decoction of the bitter root is given in dyspepsia, hiccory, tympanitis, &c. T. Senna is used as a purgative by the inhabitants of Popayan. A blue dye is extracted from T. tinctoria, an under-shrub growing in Mysore, &c. T. Apollinea in Nubia, and T. toxicaria in the Niger region, are also dye plants.

2. Entom.: A genus of Geometer Moths, family Boarmidae. Five species are British.

tēp-id, a. [Lat. tepidus, from tepeo = to be warm, from same root as Sansc. tap = to burn.] Moderately warm; lukewarm.

Deep musing, then he best exerts his ōing.
Thomson: Autumn, l. 324.

tēp-i-dār-i-ūm, s. [Lat., from tepidus = tepid (q.v.).]

Roman Antiq.: An apartment in Roman baths where the tepid water was placed; also the boiler in which the water was warmed for the tepid bath.

tēp-id-i-ty, s. [Fr. tepidité, from Lat. tepidus = tepid.] The quality or state of being tepid or lukewarm. (Lit. & fig.)

"The tepidity and infidel baseness of the Jewish nation."—bp. Taylor: Life of Christ, pt. I, § 4.

tēp-id-nēss, s. [Eng. tepid; -ness.] Tepidity, lukewarmness.

*tē-por, s. [Lat.] Gently heat, moderate warmth.

"The small pox, mortal during such a season, grew more favourable by the tepor and moisture in April."—Arbuthnot.

tēq-ēz-quite (q as k), s. [A corrupt of Tequexiquil, the Mexican name for a mineral substance found at Texcoco, Zumpango.]

Min.: A mixture of various salts, consisting principally of carbonate of soda and chloride of sodium (common salt).

tēr-a-crīl-ic, a. [Eng. ter(ebic), and acrylic.] Derived from, or containing terebic and acrylic acid.

teracrylic-acid, s. [PYROTEREBIC-ACID.]

tēr-a-phim, s. pl. [Heb. תְּרָפִים (teraphim), perhaps from an obsolete verb תָּרַף (taraph) = to live agreeably or in plenty. (Gesenius.)]

Jewish Antiq.: Household gods, like the Roman Penates. The "images" which Rachel stole from her father Laban are called in Hebrew teraphim (Gen. xxxi. 19, 34, 35). Perhaps they were the "strange gods" given up by Jacob's household, and by him hid under the "oak" at Shechem (xxv. 2, 4). Again, the "image" which Michal put in David's bed, and which was intended to be mistaken for him, is called in Hebrew teraphim, a plural form, though apparently only with a singular meaning. It was probably of the human form and size (1 Sam. xix. 13). Michal manufactured one or more (Judges xvii. 5, xviii. 14, 17, 18, 20). Teraphim are often mentioned in connection with ephods, and in Zech. x. 2, it is stated that the teraphim (A. V. idols) have spoken vanity, implying that they were consulted as oracles by the Jews, as ephods were (1 Sam. xxiii. 9, 12, xxx. 7). The Babylonians used them for a similar purpose (Ezek. xxi. 21). Samuel denounced them (1 Sam. xv. 23), and Josiah put them away, with wizards, idols, &c. (2 Kings xxiii. 24). The English reader must have recourse to the R. V. to find where the word teraphim occurs in the Old Testament, as in all but one passage (Hosea iii. 4) the A. V. translates it by other words.

tēr-a-pin, s. [TERRAPIN.]

tēr-ās, s. [Gr. τέρας (teras) = a monster.]

Entom.: A genus of Cynipidae. The puncture by Teras terminalis of oak twigs produces the gall called oak-apple.

*tēr-ā-ic-al, a. [Gr. τέρας (teras), genit. τέρατος (teratos) = a sign, a wonder.] Marvellous, wonderful, miraculous.

tēr-āt-ich-thys, s. [Pref. tera(o), and Gr. ἰχθύς (ichthus) = a fish.]

Palaont.: A genus of Gymnodontidae. Known British species one, from the Lower Eocene.

tēr-a-tē, pref. [TERRATICAL.] Marvellous; or of belonging to monsters or anything wonderful.

tēr-a-tōg-ēn-y, s. [Pref. terato, and Gr. γεννάω (gennao) = to produce.]

Med.: The formation of monsters.

tēr-āt-ō-lite, s. [Pref. terato, and Gr. λίθος (lithos) = a stone; Lat. terra miraculosa; Ger. wundererde.]

Min.: An impure variety of lithomarge (q.v.), found at Planitz, Saxony.

tēr-a-tō-lōg-ic-al, a. [Eng. teratology (y); -ical.] Of or pertaining to teratology; dealing with or treating of monsters or marvels.

tēr-a-tōl-ō-gist, s. [Eng. teratology (y); -ist.]

*1. One given to teratology; one who deals in marvels; a marvel-monger.

2. One who studies or is versed in the science of teratology.

tēr-a-tōl-ō-gy, s. [Pref. terato, and Gr. λόγος (logos) = a word, a discourse.]

I. That branch of biological science which deals with monsters, malformations, or deviations from the normal types in the animal and vegetable kingdoms.

*2. Affectation of sublimity in language; bombast. (Bailey.)

fāte, fāt, fāre, āmidst, whāt, fāll, father; wē, wēt, hēre, camēl, hēr, thēre; pine, pīt, sīre, sīr, marine; gō, pōt, or, wōre, wōlf, wōrk, whō, sōn; mūte, cūb, ōure, unite, cūr, rīle, fūll; trȳ, Sȳrian. æ, œ = ē; ey = ā; qu = kw.

tér-a-tò-sau'-rús, s. [Pref. terato-, and Gr. σαύρος (sauros) = a lizard.]
Paleont. : A genus of Triassic Dinosaurs.

tér-bí-úm, s. [From Ytterby in Sweden.]
Chem. : A metal, supposed by Moesander in 1843 to exist, together with erbium and yttrium, in gadolinite. Subsequent investigations have thrown considerable doubt on its existence, and it is now believed to be yttria contaminated with the oxides of the cerium metals.

térpe, tyerse*, s. [Fr. msc. tiers, fem. tierce = third; tiers = a third part, a tierce, from Lat. tertius, fem. tertia = third.] [TIERCE.]

* 1. A third part, a third.
 "The middle between them both is 50 degrees and a tierce in latitude."—Hackluyt : Voyages, iii, 210.

* 2. Measures, &c. : A cask whose contents are forty-two gallons, the third of a pipe or butt.

"For I search'd every piece of wine; yes eurs, sir, And every little tierce, that could hot tistie."
Beaumont & Fletcher : The Pilgrim, II, l.

* 3. Eccles. : The same as TIERCE, II, 2.
 "At howe tyerses." Myrrour of our Lady, p. 12

4. Scots Law : A real right, whereby a widow who has not accepted any special provision, is entitled to a life-rent of one-third of the heritage in which her husband died intestate, provided the marriage has endured for a year and a day, or has produced a living child. No widow is entitled to her tierce until she is regularly kenne'd to it. [KEN, v., A. II.]

terce-major, s.
Cards : A sequence of the three best cards in some games.

tér-çel, ter-cell*, tas-sel*, s. & a. [O. Fr. tiercelet, so called because he is commonly a third less than the female, from O. Fr. tiers, tierce = third [TIERCE]; cf. O. Ital terzolo; Ital. terzolo, from terzo = third.]

A. As subst. : The male of the falcon, espec. the common or Peregrine Falcon (Falco peregrinus).

"The falcon as the tiercel, for all the ducks I' the river."—Shakespeare : Troilus & Cressida, III, 2.

* B. As adj. : Male.
 "The tiercelle egge, as ye know full wele,
 The foule royall, aboute you all in degre."
Chaucer : Assembly of Foules.

* térçe-lét, s. [O. Fr. tiercelet.] [TIERCEL.]
 The male hawk; the male eagle.
 "Perched on his wouted eyrie high, Sleep sealed the tiercelet's wearied eye."
Scott : Rob Roy, v, 2.

* tér-çel-léno, s. [TIERCEL.] A small male hawk; a tiercelet.

tér-çén-tén-a-ry, † tér-çén-tén-a-ry, tér-çén-tén-a-ry, a. & s. [Lat. ter = thrice, and centenarius = centenary (q.v.).]

A. As adj. : Comprising three hundred years; including or relating to an interval of three hundred years.

B. As subst. : A day celebrated or observed as a festival in commemoration of some event, as a great victory, &c., which occurred three hundred years before.

"Their noble president had accustomed himself to say 'tercentenary.' But all long words that ended in 'ary,' 'ery,' 'ory,' were accented on the fourth syllable from the end, or what scholars called the 'pre-tercentenimate.' (Laughter.) If his lordship's attention were called to that little law, he would adapt his pronunciation to the common one, and would speak of the 'ter-cent-enary.'"—Dutty News, Sept. 28, 1837.

tér-çér, s. [Eng. terrace]; -er.]
Law : A tenant in dower; a dowress.

térç-ét, s. [Fr., from tiers = third.]
 1. Musical : A third.
 2. Poetry : A group of three rhyming lines; a triplet.

tér-çine, s. [Fr., from Lat. tertius = third.]
Bot. : Mirbel's name for what he considered a third coating of some seeds, internal to the secundine and primine. It is really only a layer of the primine or secundine, or the secundine itself. Called by Malpighi the Chorion.

† tere, s. [TARE (1), s.]

tér-è-bám'-íc, s. [Eng. terebic], and amic.] Derived from or containing terebic acid and ammonia.

terebamic-acid, s.
Chem. : $C_7H_{11}NO_3 = (C_7H_9O_2)' \begin{matrix} H_2 \\ N \\ O \end{matrix}$. Terebamide. Prepared by heating terebic acid in ammonia gas to 140-160°. It is slightly soluble in cold, very soluble in hot water and in alcohol.

tér-è-bám'-íde, s. [Eng. terebic], and amide.] [TEREBAMIC-ACID.]

tér-è-báte, s. [Eng. terebic]; -ate.]
Chem. : A salt of terebic acid.

tér-è-bél'-íá, s. [Dimin. from Lat. terebrá = a boring instrument.]

1. Surg. : A trepan or trephine.
 2. Zool. : The typical genus of Terebellidae (q.v.). The sheath consists of sand, pieces of shell, and other adventitious particles, held together by a glutinous secretion from the body. The young, when first they quit the eggs, are small, globular embryos, thickly covered with cilia. Then the body becomes elongate and the cilia collect in a band round the middle; eyes appear.

TEREBELLA EMMALINA.

Next the cilia diminish in size and disappear, the animal becomes able to creep along the bottom of the water; finally it builds its tube and moves about no more.

tér-è-bél'-lí-dá, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. terebell(a); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -í-dá.]

Zool. : A large family of Tubicolae. Animals sometimes eight or nine inches long, worm-shaped, thick in front and narrow behind, cephalic region often with a collar; tentacles numerous, filiform, in two groups around the mouth; no proboscis; branched or pectinate branchiae on some of the anterior segments.

tér-è-béne, s. [Lat. terebinthos] = turpentine; suff. -éne.]

Chem. : $C_{10}H_{16}$. An optically inactive isomer of oil of turpentine, prepared by the action of strong sulphuric acid on terebenthens. It has the odour of thyme-oil, sp. gr. 0.864, and boils at 156°.

tér-è-bén'-íc, a. [Terebic.]

tér-è-bén'-théne, s. [TEREBENE.]
Chem. : $C_{10}H_{16}$. Berthelot's name for the chief constituent found in French oil of turpentine, and readily obtained by neutralizing the oil with an alkaline carbonate, and distilling first over the water-bath, and then in a vacuum. It has a sp. gr. = 0.864, boils at 161°, and has a specific rotatory power of -42.3.

tér-è-bén'-tíl'-íc, a. [Eng. terebent(hene); -í, -ic.] Pertaining to or derived from terebenthene.

terebentilic-acid, s.
Chem. : $C_8H_{10}O_2 = C_8H_8 \begin{matrix} CH_3 \\ CO \cdot OH \end{matrix}$. A monobasic acid obtained by passing the vapour of turpentine over soda-lime, heated to 400°, and treating the resulting mass with hydrochloric acid. It is heavier than water, melts at 90°, boils at 250°, is slightly soluble in boiling water, but very soluble in alcohol and ether. Its vapour is acrid, and attacks the nose strongly.

tér-è-bén'-zíc, a. [Eng. terebene], and benz(o)ic.] Derived from or containing terebene.

terebenzic-acid, s.
Chem. : $C_{14}H_{18}O_4$ (?) Produced by the action of nitric acid on oil of turpentine. It crystallizes in small shining needles, insoluble in cold, soluble in boiling water and in cold alcohol, melts at 169°, and boils at a much higher temperature.

tér-rób'-íc, a. [Eng. terebic]; -ic.] Pertaining to or derived from terebena.

terebic-acid, s.
Chem. : $C_7H_{10}O_4 = (C_7H_8O_2)' \begin{matrix} H_2 \\ O_2 \end{matrix}$. Terebenic acid. Terebic acid. A dibasic acid prepared by heating oil of turpentine with four parts of nitric acid of sp. gr. 1.25. It crystallizes in four-sided, colourless prisms, with oblique terminal faces, dissolves in about 100 parts of cold water, more readily in boiling water, alcohol, and ether; melts at 200° without loss of weight, but at a higher temperature begins to decompose. It forms salts called terebates, of little importance.

terebic-ethers, s. pl.
Chem. : Acid ethers prepared by the direct action of terebic acid on the several alcohols; thus, ethyl-terebic acid, $C_7H_9(C_2H_5O)_4 = C_7H_8O_2 \begin{matrix} C_2H_5 \\ H \end{matrix} \cdot O_2$, is an oil having a burning taste, sparingly soluble in water, and very unstable.

tér-è-bíl'-íc, a. [Terebic.]

* tér-è-bín-tá'-çé-sé, tér-è-bín-thá'-çé-sé, s. pl. [Lat. terebinth(us); fem. pl. adj. suff. -áceo-].

Bot. : An order founded by Jussieu in 1789, and including all the turpentine-bearing plants. These are now distributed among the orders Amyridaceae, Anacardiaceae, Connaraceae, Xanthoxylaceae, &c.

tér-è-bínth, s. [Lat. terebinthus; Gr. τερεβινθος (terebinthos) = the terebinth or turpentine tree.]

1. Botany :
 (1) The terebinth tree (q.v.).
 (2) (Pl.) : An alternative name for the Anacards. [ANACARDIACEAE.]

2. Comm. & Pharm. : Various resins, balsams, and spec. Common and Venetian turpentine, and Canada balsam.

terebinth-tree, s.
Bot. : Pistacia Terebinthus, the Chic or Cyprus Turpentine tree. Leaves unequally pinnate, generally three pairs with a terminal one; flowers small; fruit small, dark, purple, rounded, and furrowed. The turpentine flows from incisions in the stem, and is left to harden. A gall produced upon the tree by the puncture of insects is used in dyeing, and for tanning one kind of Moreoco leather.

* tér-è-bín-thí'-ná, s. [Terebinth.] An old name for turpentine (q.v.).

tér-è-bínth-in-áte, a. & s. [Lat. terebinthin(us) = of the terebinth tree; Eng. suff. -ate.]

A. As adj. : Impregnated with the qualities of turpentine; terebinthine.

"During the summer the tree sends out a pleasant terebinthinate odour."—London: Encyclop. of Plants (ed. 1880), p. 805.

B. As substantive :
Med. : A preparation of the turpentine of firs.
 "Salt serum may be evacuated by urine, by terebinthinates; as tops of pine in salt our sie."—Flojer.

tér-è-bín-thíne, a. [Lat. terebinthinus, from terebinthos = the terebinth (q.v.).] Pertaining to turpentine; consisting of turpentine; partaking of the qualities of turpentine.

* tér-è-bínth-ús, s. [Terebinth.]
Bot. : A genus of plants founded by Jussieu, now reduced to a synonym of Pistacia (q.v.).

tér-è-brá, s. [Lat. = a boring instrument; tero = to pierce.]

Zool. & Paleont. : Auger-shell; a genus of Buceinidae (q.v.). Shell long, pointed, many whorled; aperture small; canal short; operculum pointed, nucleus apical. Animal blind, or with eyes near the summit of minute tentacles. All the shells are smooth, and ornamented with variegated spots, generally red, brown, and orange. Recent species 110, mostly tropical. Fossil twenty-four, from the Eocene of Britain, France, and Chili.

tér-è-brá'-lí-á, s. pl. [Mod. Lat., from Lat. terebrá = a borer.]

Zool. : A sub-genus of Potamidae. Shell pyramidal, columella with a prominent fold towards its apex, and a second less distinct one on the basal fronts of the whorls. From India and North Australia. Terebralia telescopium is so abundant near Calcutta that the shells are burnt for lime. (S. P. Woodward.)

ból, hóy; póut, jówl; cat, çell, chorus, çhín, bençh; go, gem; thin, this; sin, aş; expect, Xenophon, exíst. -íng, -élan, -tian = şhan. -tion, -sion = şhün; -ñion, -şion = zhün. -cious, -tiuous, -sious = şhús. -ble, -dle, &c. = beł, deł.

tér-ě-brant, a. [TEREBRANT.] Possessed of an ovipositor; of or belonging to the Terebrantia.

terebrant-hymenoptera, s. pl. [TEREBRANTIA (1).]

tér-ě-brán-ti-a (ti as sh), s. pl. [Neut. pl. of Lat. terebrans, pr. par. of terebro = to bore.]

Entomology:

1. Saw-flies; a tribe of Hymenoptera having the ovipositor converted into a saw or borer. Families, Tenthredinidae and Siricidae.

2. A tribe of Physopoda in which the females have a regular ovipositor consisting of minute valves concealed in a groove of the last two ventral segments. Antennae usually nine-jointed. [THRIPS.]

*tér-ě-bráto, v. t. [Lat. terebratus, pa. par. of terebro = to bore; terebra = a boring instrument.] To bore, to pierce with or as with a boring instrument.

"Earthworms being made in the most complete manner possible for terebrating the earth, and creeping where their occasions lead them."—Derham: Flapico-theology, bk. IV, ch. xii.

tér-ě-brá-těl-lá, s. [Mod. Lat., dimm. from Lat. terebratus = perforated.]

Zool. & Palaeont.: A genus of Terebratulidae (q.v.), with twenty-five species distributed among several sub-genera. Shell smooth or radiately plicated; dorsal valve longitudinally impressed; hinge-line approximately straight; beak with a flattened area on each side of the deltidium, which is incomplete, foramen large; loop attached to the septum. The genus appears first in the Chalk.

*tér-ě-brá-tien, s. [Lat. terebratio, from terebratus, pa. par. of terebro = to bore, to perforate; Fr. terebration.] The act of boring, perforating, or piercing.

"It hath been touched before, that terebration of trees doth make them prosper better; but it is found also, that it maketh the fruit sweeter, and better."—Bacon: Nat. Hist., § 463.

tér-ě-brát-ŭ-lá, s. [Mod. Lat., dimm. from Lat. terebratus = perforated.]

Zool. & Palaeont.: The type-genus of Terebratulidae (q.v.). Shell smooth, convex; beak truncated and perforated; foramen circular; deltidium of two pieces frequently blended; loop very short, simple, attached by its crura to the hinge-plate. Animal attached by a pedicel; brachial disc trilobed, centre lobe elongated and spirally convoluted. Terebratula proper has three recent species, from the Mediterranean, Vigo Bay, and the Falkland Islands; fossil, 120, from the Devonian onward. Sub-genera: Terebratulina, Waldheimia, Meganteris, and Rensselaria, the latter from the Silurian to the Devonian.

tér-ě-brá-tŭ-lí-dæ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. terebratul(a); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -ida.]

Zool. & Palaeont.: A family of Brachiopoda (q.v.). Woodward enumerates five genera, to which Tate adds two others. Shell minutely punctate; usually round or oval, smooth or striated; ventral valve with a prominent beak and two curved hinge-teeth; dorsal valve with depressedumbo, a prominent cardinal process between the dental sockets, and a slender shelly loop. Animal attached by a pedicel, or by the ventral valves; oral arms united by a membrane, variously folded, sometimes spiral at their extremities. The family is numerous and widely distributed in time and space. The generic and sub-generic forms are usually classified according to the modifications of the loop or calcified support for the respiratory and alimentary organs, the simplest and highest type of this loop being found in Terebratula (q.v.). The family was represented in Silurian seas, and reached its maximum about the dawn of the Tertiary epoch, since when many of its representatives have become extinct.

tér-ě-brá-tŭ-lí-ferm, a. [Mod. Lat. terebratula, and Eng. form.] Shaped like the shell of Terebratula (q.v.).

tér-ě-brát-ŭ-lí-ná, s. [Mod. Lat., dimm. from terebratula (q.v.).]

Zool. & Palaeont.: A sub-genus of Terebratula (q.v.). Loop short, rendered annular in the adult by the union of the oral processes. Recent species six, from the United States, Norway, Cape, and Japan; fossil twenty-two, from the Oxford Clay.

*tér-ě-brát-ŭ-lite, s. [Mod. Lat. terebratul(a); suff. -ite.] Any fossil species of the genus Terebratula (q.v.).

tér-ě-cám-phène, s. [Eng. tere(bene), and camphene.]

Chem.: A solid crystallizable body, somewhat resembling camphor, produced by heating to 220° the solid hydro-chloride prepared from French turpentine, with potassium stearate or dry soap. It melts at 45°, and boils at 160°.

tér-ě-chryś-ic, a. [Eng. tere(bio); chryś(in), and suff. -ic.] Pertaining to or containing terebic acid and chrysin.

terechryśic-acid, s.

Chem.: C₈H₆O₆. An acid, said to be obtained, together with oxalic, terephthalic, and terebic acids, in the watery liquid obtained by oxidising oil of turpentine with nitric acid diluted with an equal bulk of water. (H Watts.)

tér-ě-dí-ná, s. [Lat. teredo (q.v.).]

Zool. & Palaeont.: A sub-genus of Tereido. The valves have an accessory valve in front of the umbones, the aperture of the tube is sometimes shaped like an hour-glass, or six-lobed.

tér-ě-dí-ne, s. [Fr., from Mod. Lat. teredina. (Larousse.)] A doubtful word, usually defined as = the teredo; but possibly formed erroneously from the Lat. teredines (pl. of teredo), which occurs in Adams:

"A better piece of timber hath the more teredines breeding in it."—Works, I. 505.

tér-ě-dě, s. [Lat., from Gr. τερεδών (teredōn), from terpeo (tereo) = to bore, to pierce.]

1. Bot.: Any disease in plants produced by the boring of insects.

2. Zool. & Palaeont.: A genus of Pholadidae. Worm-like Molluscs, having a sucker-like foot with a foliaceous border, and long, cord-like gills; shell globular, open in front and behind, lodged at the inner extremity of a burrow, in whole or in part lined with shell; valve three-lobed, concentrically striated. Known species: recent, twenty-one, from Britain, Norway, the Black Sea, and the tropics, to 119 fathoms deep. Teredo navalis, the Ship worm, is a soft, cylindrical, somewhat vermiform mollusc, two' or two and a half feet long, with two small shells at its anterior extremity. It bores into timber, and is exceedingly destructive to ships. In 1731 and 1732 it created alarm in Holland by boring into the piles constituting part of the defence of the country against the inroads of the sea. Though teak is not so easily attacked as many other kinds of timber, yet it does not wholly escape. The best protection against the teredo is metal sheathing and broad-headed iron nails hammered into the wood. Fossil species twenty-four, from the Lias onward. Used also of any individual of the genus.

tě-rěn-íte, s. [Gr. τέρην (terēn) = friable; suff. -ite.]

Minerology:

1. A mineral occurring in crystals with the form of scapolite, also massive. Not analyzed, but atated to be probably a variety of acapolite. Found in a small vein in limestone at Antwerp, New York.

2. A name given by D'Aubuisson to certain friable clay-slates or shales, notably those of the carboniferous formation.

těr-ěph-thál'-á-míde, s. [Eng. tere(bio); phthal(ic), and amide.]

Chem.: C₈H₆N₂O₂ = N₂H₄(C₈H₄O₂)". Aterephthalic amide. An insoluble, white, amorphous body, produced by the action of ammonia on terephthalic chloride.

těr-ěph-thál'-ic, a. [Eng. tere(bio), and phthalic.] Derived from or containing terebic and phthalic acids.

tere-phthalic-acid, s.

Chem.: C₈H₆O₄ = C₆H₄(CO₂H)₂. Insoluble acid. A dibasic acid produced by the action of strong aqueous potash at the boiling heat on phenylene cyanide. It forms a white, tasteless, crystalline powder, nearly insoluble in water, alcohol, and ether, and sublimes without previous fusion at about 300°.

tere-phthalic-amide, s. [TEREPHTHAL-AMIDE.]

tere-phthalic-chloride, s.

Chem.: C₆H₄O₂Cl₂. Produced by the action of phosphoric pentachloride on terephthalic acid. It forms beautiful crystals, smells like benzoic chloride, and resembles it in all its reactions.

těr-ě-ś, a. [Lat. = round, smooth.] Round, cylindrical; used substantively in anatomy as a name for certain muscles and ligaments on account of their shape, as teres major, teres minor, &c.

Těr-ě-śi-an, s. [See def.]

Church Hist.: A member of the Diocessed Carmelites of either sex, living under the reformed rule introduced by St. Teresa in the latter half of the sixteenth century.

*těr-ět, a. [TERETE.]

těr-ěto, *těr-ě-toŭs, *těr-ět, a. [Lat. teres, genit. teretis = round, smooth, from tero to rub.] Cylindrical and smooth; long and round; columnar, as some stems of plants. Opposed to angular (q.v.).

"To the stars nature hath given no such instruments, but made them round and teret like a globe."—Fotherby: Athematic, p. 228.

těr-ě-tŭm, s. [Gr. τερπέσμα (teretisma) = the chirping of awallows.] Rough and unmelodious noise. (Hall: Saïres, IV. i. 3.)

*těr'-gal, a. [Lat. tergum] = the back; Eng. adj. suff. -al.] Of or pertaining to the back; dorsal.

těr-gant, těr-gi-ant, a. [Lat. tergum = the back.]

Her.: Showing the back part; as, an eagle tergant displayed.

TERGANT.

těr-gém-in-ál, těr-gém-in-ate, a. [TERGEMINOUS.] Thrice double; specif. in botany three-paired; the term used when each of two secondary petioles bears towards its summit one pair of leaflets, and the common petiole bears a third pair at the origin of the two secondary petioles, as in Mimosa tergemina. (Mirbel.)

*těr-gém-in-óus, a. [Lat. tergeminus, from ter = thrice, and geminus = twin, double.] Thrice double, three-paired, tergeninate.

těr-gíf-ěr-óus, a. [Lat. tergum = the back, and fero = to bear.] Bearing or carrying on the back; as tergiferous plants, such as bear their seeds on the backs of their leaves as ferns; dorsiferous.

*těr-gív-ěr-sáto, v. t. [Lat. tergiversatus, pa. par. of tergiverso = to turn one's back, to refuse, to shuffle; tergum = the back, and verso = to turn one's self about; versus, pa. par. of verto = to turn.] To shift, to shuffle; to practise evasion, shifts, or subtifuges.

"Who else if he were conscious that his assentment to the Platonic theology were not so defensible a thing, doth himself sometime as if were tergiversate and decline it by equivocating in the word hesedus."—Cudworth: Intel. Syst., p. 569.

těr-gív-ěr-sá-tion, s. [Fr. tergiversation, from Lat. tergiversationem, accua. of tergiversatio, from tergiversatus, pa. par. of tergiverso = to tergiversate (q.v.).]

1. The act of tergiversating; a shifting or shuffling; a shift, an evasion, a subtifuge.

"But that no suspicion of tergiversation may be fastened upon me, I am content to deal with you a little, at your own weapons."—Chillingworth: Relig. of Protestants, pt. I, ch. v., § 85.

2. The act of changing or of turning one's back on one's opinions; the act of turning back on a cause formerly advocated; the act of a turncoat.

*těr-gív-ěr-sá-těr, s. [Lat.] One who practises tergiversation.

*těr-ğí-vörse, v. t. [Lat. tergiverso = to tergiversate (q.v.).] To turn one's back.

"The Briton never tergiversate. But was for adverse drubbing."—Saint George for England, pt. II.

těr-ğüm, s. [Lat. = the back.]

1. Entom.: The upper surface of the abdomen in insects.

2. Zool.: The dorsal arc of the annite of an arthropod, as of a Crustacean or an Arachnid.

*těr-in, s. [Fr. tarin.] A kind of angling bird; the alskin. [TARIN.]

fáto, fát, fáre, ámidst, whát, fáll, fáther; wé, wét, hère, camél, hër, thère; píne, píť, síre, sír, maríne; gó, pět, or, wóre, wólf, wérk, whó, sóz; múte, cúb, cüre, quíte, cür, rúle, füll; trý, Sířlan. æ, ø = é; ey = ä; qu = kw.

term, *tearm, *tearme, *terme, s. [Fr. terme = a term, time, or day, a word, from Lat. terminum, accus. of terminus = a boundary-line, a bound, a limit (whence terminal, terminate, terminus); cf. Gr. rēpua (terma) = a limit; O. Lat. termen; Sp. termino; Ital. termine, termino.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. The extremity of anything; a limit, a bound, a boundary.

"Corruption is a reciprocal to generation; and they two are as nature's two terms or boundaries, and the guides to life and death."—Bacon: Natural History.

2. The time or period during which anything lasts; any limited time; a time or period fixed in any way.

"Doomed for a certain term to walk the night."—Shakespeare: Hamlet, I. 4.

3. In universities, colleges, and schools, the period during which instruction is regularly given to students. In the United States the public school year is usually divided into two terms. In England the division is usually into three terms. College and university years are variously divided, according to circumstances. In England the Oxford university year is divided into four terms, that of Cambridge into three.

4. The time during which the law-courts are held or are open for the trial of causes. In the United States the National and the State Supreme Courts hold each one annual term, with special terms as circumstances require. The lower courts have usually four terms annually, this fact being indicated in the title of one court, that of Quarter Sessions. The English courts had formerly four terms in every year, viz.: Hilary term, beginning on January 11, and ending January 31; Easter term, beginning April 15, and ending May 8; Trinity term, beginning May 22, and ending June 12; and Michaelmas term, beginning Nov. 2, and ending Nov. 25. The other portions of the year are called Vacation. This system has been abolished so far as relates to the administration of justice.

"They [lawyers] sleep between term and term."—Shakespeare: As You Like It, III. 2.

5. A word by which something fixed or definite is expressed or designated; a word having a definite and specific meaning, and naming or characterizing some particular person, thing, act, quality, or the like; especially, a word having a technical meaning; as, technical terms, scientific terms, &c.

"Of your juggling terms penance I can not affirm."—Tyndal: Works, p. 320.

6. (Pl.): Language or words generally.

"As you would say in plaid terms."—Shakespeare: Merchant of Venice, II. 2.

7. (Pl.): Conditions; stipulations; propositions stated and offered for acceptance.

"If we can make our peace upon such large terms and so absolute."—Shakespeare: 2 Henry IV., IV. 1.

¶ Hence used for charge, rate of payment; as, What are your terms for singing lessons?

† 8. (Pl.): Terms; situation; circumstances.

"The State of our estate may not endure hazards so dangerous."—Shakespeare: Hamlet, III. 4.

9. (Pl.): Relative position; relation; footing; position.

"The Ambassadors must therefore try to be on good terms with those who were out as well as with those who were in."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. XXIII.

II. Technically:

1. Arch.: A pedestal widening towards the top, where it merges into a bust; a terminal figure. [TERMINUS.]

2. Alg.: A member of a compound quantity; as, a in a + b, ab in ab + cd; a single expression connected with any other by the signs plus or minus.

3. Geom.: The extreme of any magnitude, or that which limits or bounds its extent; thus, the terms of a line are points; the terms of a superficies, lines, &c.

4. Law:

(1) An estate or interest in land to be enjoyed for a fixed period; the period itself; more fully called a term of years, a term for years.

(2) A day on which rent or interest is payable, commonly called quarter-days (q.v.). In Scotland houses are let from May 25th for a year or a period of years.

(3) Scots Law: A certain time fixed by authority of a court within which a party is allowed to establish his averment by evidence.

5. Logic: The subject or predicate of a proposition; one of the three component parts of a syllogism, each of which is used twice. Terms are divided into simple, singular, universal, common, univocal, equivocal, analogous, abstract, concrete, &c. The predicate of the conclusion of a syllogism is called the major term, because it is the most general; the subject of the conclusion is called the minor term, as being less general. These are called the extremes, and the third term introduced as a common measure between them is called the mean or middle term. [SYLLOGISM.]

6. Med. (Pl.): The monthly uterine secretions of women.

7. Ship-build.: The same as TERM-PIECE (q.v.).

¶ (1) Terms of an equation:

Alg.: The several parts of which it is composed connected by the signs + or -. Thus, 2³ - 6x² + 11x - 6 = 0 is an equation composed of four terms.

(2) Terms of a fraction:

Math.: The numerator and denominator of the fraction.

(3) Terms of a proportion (or progression):

Math.: The several separate quantities of which the proportion (or progression) consists.

(4) Terms of a ratio:

Math.: The antecedent and consequent of the ratio.

(5) To be under terms:

Law: To be under conditions on which indulgence is granted by the Court, as, to plead isenably. (Wharton.)

(6) To bring to terms: To reduce to submission or to conditions.

(7) To come to terms: To agree; to come to an agreement.

(8) To make terms: To come to an agreement.

term-fee, s.

Law: A fee or certain sum charged to a suitor for each term his cause is in court.

term-piece, s.

Ship-build.: A piece of carved work placed under each end of the taffrail of a ship, at the side timbers of the stern, and extended down as low as the foot-rail of the balcony.

têrm, *tearme, v.t. [TEAM, s.] To tame, to call, to denominate, to express.

"As maister Gersonue in the Latin tongue termeth it."—Sir T. More: Works, p. 1, 318.

*têr-ma-gan-cy, s. [Eng. termagan(t); -cy.] The quality or state of being a termagant; turbulence, violence.

"By violent termagany of temper, she may never suffer him to have a moment's peace."—Barker.

têr-ma-gant, *ter-ma-gaunt, a. & s.

[From Termagant, the name of one of the idols whom the Saracens are represented in mediæval romances as worshipping. He was afterwards introduced into the old Moralities as a person of violent temper, so that a ranting actor might appear to advantage in that character (Shakespeare: Hamlet, II. 2). It is a corrupt of O. Fr. Termagant, Tervagan, or Tarvagan, used for a Saracen idol, from Ital. Trivagante, Trivigante, prob. = the moon, as wandering under the three names of Seleue (or Luna) in heaven, Artemis (or Diana) on earth, and Persephone (or Proserpine) in the lower world; from Lat. ter = thrice, and vagans, pr. par. of vagor = to wander.]

A. As adj.: Violent, quarrelsome, boisterous, turbulent.

"'Twas time to counterfeit, or that hot termagant Scot had paid me scot and lot too."—Shakespeare: 1 Henry IV., v. 4.

B. As substantive:

¶ 1. The name given by the writers of mediæval romances to a fabled Saracen idol. (See etym.)

"Nor fright the reader with the Pagan vaunt, Of mighty Mahound, and great Termagant."—hp. Hall: Satires, I. 1.

¶ 2. A turbulent, brawling, scolding, or abusive person. (Originally applied to men rather than women.)

"Thou delightest to play the tyrant and termagant among them."—Rogers: Naaman the Syrian, p. 276.

¶ 3. A boisterous, abusive, scolding, or violent woman; a shrew, a virago.

"An imperious and reckless termagant."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xv.

*têr-ma-gant-ly, adv. [Eng. termagant;

-ly.] In a termagant or abusive manner; like a termagant; extravagantly, outrageously.

"A nose so termagantly rubicund."—F. Brown: Works, I. 116.

*termo-lesse, a. [TERMLESS.]

têrm-êr, *tearm-er, a. [Eog. term, a.; -er.]

¶ 1. One who travelled up to attend court terms; one who resorted to London in term-time only for the sake of tricks to be practised or intrigues to be carried on at that period, the law terms being formerly the great times of resort to London, not only for business but for pleasure. (Nares.)

"Nor have my title leaf on posts or walls, Or in cleft sticks advanced to make calls For termers, or some clerk-like serving man."—Ben Jonson: Epigram 8.

¶ 2. One who terms or names.

¶ 3. The same as TERMER (q.v.).

têr-môg (pl. têr-mî-tôg), s. [Lat. termes, genit. termittis = a wood-worm. Cf. also termes = the branch of a tree, a bough cut from a tree.]

1. Entom.: White ant, the typical genus of Termitidæ (q.v.). The antennæ are as long as the head and thorax, inserted in front of the eyes, and composed of about eighteen joints. [TERMITIDÆ.]

2. Palæont.: A species occurs in the Purbeck beds.

têr-min-a-ble, a. [As if from a Lat. terminabilis, from termino = to terminate (q.v.).] Capable of being terminated; limitable; terminating after a certain period.

"The terminable pains of a part of hell."—Taylor: Dissertation from Popery, pt. I. § 4.

têr-min-a-ble-ness, s. [Eng. terminable; -ness.] The quality or state of being terminable.

têr-min-al, a. & s. [Lat. terminalis, from terminus = a boundary-line, a limit, a bound; Fr., Sp., & Port. terminal; Ital. terminale.]

A. As adjective:

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Pertaining or relating to a boundary, limit, or limitation; pertaining to or forming a limit or extremity.

2. Of or pertaining to the terminus of a railway; charged at a terminus.

II. Technically:

1. Bot.: Proceeding from the end; ending, bounding.

2. Geom.: Forming an edge or extremity. Thus we speak of the terminal edge of a polyhedron, and sometimes of the terminal faces of a solid. Terminal is nearly synonymous with limiting.

3. Logic: Constituted by or relating to a term.

B. As substantive:

I. Ordinary Language:

1. That which terminates; a bound, a limit, an extremity, an end.

2. A terminal charge; a charge made for the use of termini or stations on a railway.

"On the vexed question of terminals the railway companies take a very firm stand."—Morning Post, Feb. 8, 1888.

3. A terminal railroad station or depot.

II. Electro-magn.: The clamping-screw at each end of a voltaic battery, used for connecting it with the wires which complete the circuit. One terminal is at the copper or negative pole, and the other at the zinc or positive pole. Their connection by wire starts the battery into action.

terminal-bud, s.

Bot.: A bud situated at the end of a branch.

terminal-figure, s. The same as TERMINUS, II. 2.

terminal-form, s. [TERMINAL-VALUE.]

terminal-moraine, s. [MORAINÉ.]

terminal-stigma, s.

Bot.: A stigma placed at the end of a style.

terminal-stylo, s.

Bot.: A style placed at the summit of the ovary.

terminal-value, terminal-form, s.

Math.: The last and most complete value or form given to an expression.

terminal-velocity, s. In the theory of projectiles, the greatest velocity which a body can acquire by falling freely through the air, the limit being arrived at when the increase of the atmospheric resistance becomes equal to the increase of the force of gravity.

tër-min-â-lô-æ, s. pl. [From Mod. Lat. terminalia, 2.]

Bot. A tribe of Combretaceæ, having the corolla generally wanting and the cotyledons convolute.

tër-min-â-ll-â, s. pl. [Lat., neut. pl. of terminalis = pertaining or relating to a boundary or limit.] [TERMINUS.]

1. Roman Antiq.: A festival celebrated annually on the 23rd of February in honour of Terminus, the god of boundaries. It was then usual for peasants to assemble near the principal landmarks which separated their fields, and, after they had crowned them with garlands and flowers, to make libations of milk and wine, and to sacrifice a lamb or a young pig. The public festival was celebrated at the sixth milestone on the road to Laurentum, because at one time that was the limit of Roman territory. [TERMINUS, II. 1.]

2. Bot. (As a pseudo-singular): The typical genus of Terminalæ (q.v.). Trees and shrubs with alternate leaves, usually crowded at the end of the branches. Inflorescence in racemose and paniced spikes, generally hermaphrodite in their lower part, and only stamiferous above; calyx campanulate, five-cleft, the lobes acute; corolla wanting; stamens ten; ovary with two ovules; drupe with but one seed. From the tropics of Asia and America. Terminalia Chebula is a large and valuable tree, eighty to a hundred feet high, growing in India and Burmah. The fruit is ellipsoid or obovoid and five-ribbed, from three-quarters of an inch to an inch and a quarter in length. The pounded rind gives the black myrobalaan (q.v.). The bark of the tree is used for tanning and dyeing. There are often galls upon it, which are also used for dyeing. Another of the Myrobalaans is T. bellerica, sixty or eighty feet high. It grows in India. The leaves and the fruit are used for tanning and dyeing. Other Indian species said to be used for tanning and dyeing are T. Arjuna, T. Catappa, T. citrina, T. paniculata, and T. tomentosa. The fruits of T. Catappa, sometimes called the Almonds, are eaten; so are the kernels of T. Chebula, which, however, if taken in large quantities, produce intoxication. A gum like gum arabic is exuded from its bark. T. Chebula was believed by the old Hindus to be alterative and tonic. The fruits of T. bellerica are astringent and laxative; the other Indian species are also medicinal. The milky juice of T. Benzoin becomes fragrant on being dried. It is burnt in churches in Mauritius as a kind of incense. A drastic resin flows from T. argentea, a Brazilian species. The root of T. latifolia is given in Jamaica in diarrhœa. The bark of T. alata is astringent and antifebrile. The wood of T. tomentosa, when polished, resembles walnut, and has been used in India for making stethoscopes.

tër-min-ant, s. [Lat. terminans, pr. par. of termino = to terminate (q.v.).] Termination, ending.

"Neither of both are of like terminant," Pultenham. English Poets, bk. II, ch. ix.

* tër-mine, *ter-myne, vt. [Lat. termino = to terminate (q.v.); Fr. terminer.] 1. To fix, to limit.

"Etsi-one be termyneth [Lat. terminat] sum dai."—Ebreweis iv.

2. To terminate, to limit, to confine.

"How absurd had these guests been, if they had terminated the thanks in the servitors."—Bp. Hall: Contempt; Five Loaves.

tër-min-ër, s. [Eng. termin(e); -er.] Law: A determining; as in Oyer and terminer. [OVER.]

* tër-mi-nine, s. [TERMINE.] A limit, a boundary.

"All Jotely move upon one axletree, Whose terminis is termed the world's wide pole."—Marlowe: Doctor Faustus, II. 2.

tër-min-ism, s. [Ger. and Mod. Lat. terminismus, from Lat. terminus (q.v.).] 1. Church Hist.: The belief that there is a terminus in each man's life, after which he is no longer capable of receiving grace or pardon for his sins. This doctrine occasioned a controversy at Leipzig in the seventeenth century, the chief movers in which were Reicheberg, who upheld the doctrine, and Ittig, who denied it.

† 2. Philos.: The same as NOMINALISM (q.v.).

tër-min-ist, s. [Mod. Lat. terminista.] 1. One who holds that there is a period in every man's life, after which he is incapable of becoming the subject of grace. [TERMINISM, I.]

2. A Nominalist (q.v.), because the Nominalists held that Universals were names, or terms, and not things.

"The Realists were more powerful than the Nominalists, or the Terminists as they were called."—Moshelm (ed. Reid), p. 426.

tër-min-ô-lôg-ic-al, a. [Eng. terminolog(y); -ical.] Of or pertaining to terminology.

tër-min-ô-lôg-ic-al-ly, adv. [Eng. terminological; -ly.] In a terminological manner; by way of terminology.

tër-min-ôl-ô-gy, tër-môn-ôl-ô-gy, s. [Lat. terminus = a limit, a term (q.v.), and Gr. λόγος (logos) = a word; Fr. terminologie.]

1. The doctrine or science of technical terms; teaching or theory regarding the proper use of terms.

2. The terms collectively used in any art, science, or the like; nomenclature: as, the terminology of botany.

tër-min-thüs (pl. tër-min-thi), s. [Gr. τερατιώδης (teratinthos).] Pathol.: A tumour in the skin, of a blackish colour, inclining to green, and resembling the fruit of the terebinth. It is painful, and affects the arms, hands, and thighs.

tër-min-üs (pl. tër-min-i), s. [Lat. = a boundary, a limit, a term (q.v.); Sp. termino; Ital. termine, terminio.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. A boundary, a limit; a stone or other mark raised to define the boundary of a property.

"The terminus ad quem is the terminating point, the terminus a quo the starting point. Both terms are occasionally used in law.

2. The station at the end of a railroad, or important section of a railroad.

3. An end; the end of a journey; a goal.

"I go straight to my terminus, wherever it is."—Lezer: The Brambleths of Bishop's Folly, ch. xliii.

II. Technically:

1. Roman Antiq.: A divinity at Rome, who was supposed to preside over boundaries. His worship was first introduced at Rome by Numa. His temple was on the Tarpeian rock, and he was represented with a human head, without feet or arms, to intimate that he never moved, wherever he was.

2. Arch.: A bust or figure of the upper portion of the human body, terminating in a downwardly tapering block; employed as a pillar, baluster, or detached ornament for a niche. Called also a Terminal-figure.

TERMINUS.

tër-mi-târ-ÿ-üm, (pl. tër-mi-târ-i-â), s. [Lat. termes, genit. termitis = a wood-worm.] The hillock or residence of the white-ant. [TERMITE.]

tër-mi-târ-ÿ, s. [TERMITARIUM.] The domicile of a community of Termites; a termitarium.

tër-mite, s. [Fr., from Lat. termes (q.v.)] Entomology:

1. Any individual of the family Termitidæ, and spec. of the genus Termes.

2. (Pl.): The family Termitidæ (q.v.).

tër-mit-ÿ-dæ, s. pl. [Lat. termes, genit. termit(is); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -idæ.]

Entom.: White Ants; a family of Pseudoneuroptera, tribe Socialia. The mature males and females have the antennæ with thirteen to twenty beaded joints, the compound eyes rounded; ocelli two; the head projecting fâte, fât, fâre, amidst, whât, fall, father; wê, wêt, hère, camel, hër, there; pine, pît, sire, sir, marine; gô, pô, or, wöre, wôlf, wörk, whô, sôa; müte, cüb, cüre, ünite, öür, rüle, füll; trÿ, Sÿrian. æ, œ = ë; ey = ä; qu = kw.

in front of the prothorax; three segments of the thorax nearly equal in size; abdomen of nine distinct segments, terminating in very minute, two-jointed, spiral styles; legs simple; tarsi four-jointed; wings membranous, falling off after the nuptial flight. Besides the mature males and females, two other kinds of Termites exist, "soldiers" and "workers." The soldiers have a large, square head, with projecting mandibles, and the workers a small, rounded head, with concealed mandibles. Both are destitute of eyes, and are modified larvae. The adult males and females, when they have just reached maturity, swarm into the air, descending again after a short flight, losing their wings, and becoming the kings and queens of future termitaries. Sexual congress takes place after they have returned to the earth. The abdomen of the queen becomes of extraordinary magnitude, so that the head and thorax seem like a small excrescence on it; she is said to lay 80,000 eggs a day during her life, which lasts for about a year. The Termitidae exist chiefly in tropical and sub-tropical countries, where they are very destructive. Sparman described five South African species of Termites, T. bellicosus, T. mordax, T. atrox, T. destructor, and T. arborum. T. bellicosus builds nests of clay ten or twelve feet high, of conical form, and, when covered with vegetation, strong enough to support men and animals. T. atrox and T. mordax construct nests of a cylindrical form, with a conical roof. T. arborum builds a spherical nest in trees; some are small, others the size of a hoghead. They are constructed of bits of wood, cemented with gums and juices of trees. Other species are common in the East and West Indies. Three small species are now European, viz., T. lucifugus, abundant in some parts of France, T. flavicollis, introduced into the south of France and Portugal from Northern Africa, and T. flavipes, introduced apparently from South America. T. lucifugus infests the trunks of pines and oaks, posts, piers, &c. It has been found very destructive at Rochelle, attacking the piles on which the town is built.

tér-mi-tíd-i-úm, s. [Lat. termes, genit. termitis, and Gr. τέλος (télos) = form.] Palæont.: A genus of Neuroptera, akin to Termites. Two British species from the Purbeck beds and the Wealden.

tér-mi-tí-næ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. termes, genit. termis(is); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -inæ.] Entom.: A section of Neuropterous Insects, in which Latreille included Mantispæ, Raphidia, Termes, and Psocua.

tér-m'less, * terme-lesse, a. [Eng. term, s.; -less.] 1. Having no term or limit; unlimited, endless, boundless.

2. Inexpressible, indescribable.

"His phoenix dove began but to appear, Like unborn velvet, on that termless skin." Shaksp.: Lover's Complaint, 94.

tér-m'ly, a. & adv. [Eng. term, s.; -ly.] A. As adj.: Occurring or recurring every term.

"The clerks are partly awarded by that mean also [petty fees] for their entries, discharges, and some other writings, besides that termly fee which they are allowed."—Bacon: Office of Attorneys.

B. As adv.: Term by term; every term. "The fees, or allowances, that are termly given to these deputies, receiver, and clerks, for recompence of these their pains, I do purposely preterm; because they are not certain, but arbitrary."—Bacon: Office of Attorneys.

tér-môn-ôl-ô-ÿ, s. [TERMINOLOGY.]

tér-m'or, s. [Eng. term, s.; -or.] Law: One who has an estate for a term of years or for life.

"When by the statute 21 Hen. VIII. c. 15 the terminor (that is, he who is entitled to the term of years) was protected against these fictitious recoveries, and his interest rendered secure and permanent, long terms began to be more frequent than before."—Blackstone: Comment., bk. 1, ch. 9.

térn, s. [Dan. terne, terne; Sw. tärna; Icel. terna = a tern.] [STERNA.]

Ornith.: The popular name of any species of the genus Sterna (q.v.). They are slenderly built birds, with long, narrow, sharp-pointed wings, and forked tail, from which, as well as from their swift and circling manner of flight, they are often called Sea-swallows. The thick, soft, close plumage is coloured light blue, black, and white, varying but little with sex, age, or season of the year. They are extensively distributed, inhabiting every zone, but prefer warm and temperate climates to the colder regions, which they only visit for a short period during the year. All are exceedingly active, and from sunrise to sunset are upon the wing, generally flying very near the surface of the water, rising and sinking as the waves heave and fall. They walk badly, and are not good swimmers, their small feet rendering them but little assistance, so that they are tossed about like corka. They feed on small fish and marine animals, always taking their prey on the wing. The species are numerous. [STERNA.]

térn, a. & s. [Lat. terni = three each, from tres = three, ter = thrice.]

A. As adj.: Threefold; consisting of three. (Used chiefly in botany.)

 B. As subst.: That which consists of three things or numbers together; specif., a prize in a lottery gained by drawing three favourable numbers: the numbers themselves.

tern-flowers, s. pl.
Bot.: Flowers growing in threes.

tern-leaves, s. pl.
Bot.: Leaves arranged three in a whorl.

tern-peduncles, s. pl.
Bot.: Peduncles growing three together from the same axis.

tér-na-rý, a. & s. [Lat. ternarius, from terni = three each; Fr. ternaire.] [TERN, a.]

A. As adj.: Proceeding by three; consisting of three; applied to things, arranged in order by threes: as a flower is said to have a ternary division of its parts when it has three sepals, three petals, three stamens, &c.

"The equality is mentioned as belonging to the ternary number, here considered as a figure of the Trinity."—Waterland: Works, iv. 93.

B. As subst.: The number three; a group of three.

"The ternary, or triad, was not only accounted a sacred number amongst the Pythagoreans, but also as containing some mystery in nature."—Cudworth: Intel. System, p. 34.

tér-nate, a. [Low Lat. ternatus, from Lat. terni = three each.] [TERN, a.]

 1. Ord. Lang.: Arranged in threes; having an arrangement of parts in threes.

2. Botany:
(1) Trifoliate.
(2) Having three things, as leaves, in a whorl; ternary.

tér-nate-ly, adv. [Eng. ternate; -ly.] In a ternate manner; by threes.

† tér-nát-i-secót, a. [Low Lat. ternatus, and Lat. secus = cut.]

Bot. (Of a leaf, &c.): Cut into three lobes or partial divisions.

tér-nâ-tô-, pref. [TERNATE.] Ternary; in threes.

ternato-pinnate, a.

Bot.: The term used when the secondary petioles, to the sides of which the leaflets are attached, proceed in threes from the summit of a common petiole.

térne, a. [Etym. doubtful.] (See compound.)

terne-plate, s. A thin iron plate coated with an alloy of tin and lead.

 tér-ni-ôn, s. [Lat. ternio, from terni = three each.] A group of three; the number three; a ternary.

"Disposing them into ternions of three general hierarchies."—Ep. Hall: Inside World, bk. 1, p. 7.

térn-stroé-mi-â, s. [Named after Ternström, a Swedish naturalist and traveller, who died in 1745.]

Bot.: The typical genus of Ternstroemiaceæ (q.v.). Evergreen shrubs or trees, with coriaceous, entire or serrato-crenate leaves, five sepals, five petals, many stamens, and indehiscent fruits. Known species about twenty-five, from tropical Asia and America.

térn-stroé-mi-â-çó-æ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. ternstroemi(a); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -acæ.]

Bot.: Theads; an order of Hypogynous Exogens, alliance Guttiferales. Trees or shrubs, with alternate, coriaceous, usually undivided, exstipulate leaves, occasionally dotted. Peduncles articulated at the base, axillary or terminal; flowers usually polygamous, white, more rarely pink or red; sepals five or seven, coriaceous, deciduous, the innermost often the largest; petals five, six, or nine, often combined at the base; stamens indefinite; filaments monadelphous, polyadelphous, or distinct; style three to seven; capsule two to seven-celled, dehiscent or axile. From South America, the East Indies, China, North America, and Africa. Known genera thirty-three, species 130. [CAMELLIA, THEA.]

tér-pônes, s. pl. [Formed from Lat. terebinthus = the turpentine-tree, or from Gr. terpenlin = turpentine (q.v.).]

Chem.: A term applied to a series of hydrocarbons having the generic formula C_nH_{2n-4} . They may be all classed under two heads, those produced by synthetical means, as valyline, $C_{11}H_{18}$, and carpane, $C_{15}H_{22}$; and those found rarely formed in plants, as the turpenitines, $C_{10}H_{16}$. With the exception of the last, the terpenes have been very incompletely investigated. They are colourless or yellowish liquids, insoluble in water, but soluble in alcohol, ether, chloroform, benzene, and in the fixed and volatile oils.

tér-pi-lône, s. [TEAPENES.]

Chem.: An inactive hydrocarbon, produced by the action of weak reagents on the solid dihydrochloride, $C_{10}H_{16} \cdot 2HCl$. (Watta.)

tér-pine, s. [Eng. terpene]; -ine.]

Chem.: $C_{10}H_{16}O_2 \cdot H_2O$. A crystalline body, obtained by shaking for some time a mixture of eight parts oil of turpentine, two parts dilute nitric acid, and one part alcohol. It forms large brilliant, colourless, short rhombic prisms, soluble in boiling water, alcohol, and ether, melts at 103°, and sublimes at a higher temperature in long needles.

† tér-pin'-nâte, a. [TRIPINNATE.]

tér-pin-ôl, s. [Eng. terpin(e); -ol.]

Chem.: $C_{20}H_{34}O$. A liquid of hyacinth-like odour, produced by heating an aqueous solution of terpins with hydrochloric and sulphuric acids. It boils at 163°, and has a sp. gr. 852.

tér-pô-dí-ôn, s. [Gr. τέρον (terpō) = to delight, and ὄδῆ (ôdê) = a song, an ode.]

Music: A keyed musical instrument, invented by John David Buschmann, of Hamburg, about 1816, resembling a pianoforte in appearance, but producing notes from blocks of wood struck with hammers. The sound could be increased or diminished at pleasure.

Térp-sích-ô-rô, s. [Gr., from τέρον (terpō), fut. τέρω (terpsō) = to delight, and χορός = dancing.]

1. Class. Antiq.: One of the Muses, daughter of Jupiter and Mnemosyne. She presided over dancing, of which she was reckoned the inventress, and in which, as her name intimates, she took delight. To her was sometimes ascribed the invention of the cithara, rather than to Mercury. She is represented as a young virgin crowned with laurel, and holding in her hand a musical instrument.

2. Astron.: [ASTEROID, 81.]

térp-sích-ô-rô-an, a. & s. [TERPSICHORÆ.]

A. As adj.: Pertaining or relating to Terpsichore or dancing.

"Two terpsichorean pieces by a French composer were brought out."—Daily Telegraph, Feb. 20, 1856.

 B. As subst.: A dancer.

"Young men who will carry off before them, both as takers and terpsichorean."—Daily Telegraph, Jan. 6, 1856.

térp-siph-ô-nê, s. [Gr. τέρσις (terpsis) = delight, and φώνῆ (phônê) = a sound.]

Ornith.: A genus of Muscicapidæ, erected by Gloger for the Indian species of Cuvier's genus Muscipeta. Terpsiphone parvula is the Paradise Flycatcher, and T. affinis the Burmese Paradise Flycatcher.

tér-ra, s. [Lat. = the earth. Allied to Irish tír = land, tírmen = mainland; tírím = dry; Gael. & Wel. tír = land.] The earth; earth.

terra-alba, s. [Lat. = white earth.] Armenian bole; pipe-clay.

bôil, boy; pout, jowl; cat, çell, chorus, çhin, bench; go, gem; thin, this; sin, as; expect, Xenophon, exist. -ing. -cian, tian = shan. -tion, -sion = shün; -tion, -sion = zhün. -cious, -tious, -acious = shüs. -ble, -dle, &c. = bel, del.

terra-carlosa, s. Tripoll or rotten stone.

terra-catechu, s.

1. [CATECHU.]

2. A trade name for gambir (q.v.).

terra-cotta, s. [Ital. cotta = baked; Lat. cotta, fem. of pa. par. of coquo = to cook; Fr. terre cuite.]

1. A compound of pure clay, fine-grained, colourless sand, or calcined flints, and pulverized potsherd, moulded, dried in the air, and baked in a kiln. It is especially used for architectural decorations, figures, vases, &c.

2. A work of art in terra-cotta; specif. applied to small figures in terra-cotta found in funeral monuments in America.

"A few curious terra-cottas, recovered from the mounds have suggested comparisons with relics of the same class found so abundantly on ancient Mexican sites."—Wilson: Prehistoric Man, II. 26.

terra-cultural, a. Of or pertaining to terra-culture; agricultural.

terra-culture, s. Cultivation of the earth; agriculture.

terra di Siena, s. A ferruginous, ochrenous earth, used as a pigment in both oil and water-colour painting in its raw state and when burnt. In the latter instance it becomes of a deep orange tint, and dries more rapidly. It is transparent and durable; mixed with various blues, it yields many useful tints of green.

terra firma, s. [Lat. = firm earth.] Firm ground, solid ground or earth; dry land, as opposed to water, bog, or the like; mainland, a continent, as opposed to an island; hence, fig., a firm or secure basis or ground on which one can stand.

terra-incognita, s. [Lat. = unknown earth.] An unknown or unexplored region. (Lit. & fig.)

terra-japonica, s. [TERRA-CATECHU.]

terra-nera, s. [Ital. = black earth.] A native, unctuous pigment, used by the ancient artists in fresco, oil, and tempera-painting.

terra-nobilis, s. [Lat. = noble earth.] An old name for the diamond.

terra-orellana, s.

Bot.: Biza Orellana.

terra-penderosa, s. [Lat. = heavy earth.] Barytes, or heavy-spar (q.v.).

terra-sigillata, terra-Lemnia, s. [LEMNIAN EARTH.]

terra-verde, s. [Ital. = green earth.] A name given to two kinds of native green earth used as pigments in painting: one obtained from Monte Baldo, near Verona, the other from the island of Cyprus. The former has much more body than the latter, and is very useful in landscape painting in oil colours. It is a siliceous earth coloured by the protoxide of iron, of which it contains about twenty per cent. It is not affected by exposure to strong light or impure air.

tér-raçe, * tar-ras, * ter-ass, s. [O. Fr. terrace; Fr. terrasse = a flat, a platform, a terrace, from Ital. terraccia, terrazza = a terrace, from terra (Lat. terra) = earth; Sp. terrazza.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. A raised level space or platform of earth, supported on one or more sides by masonry; a bank or platform of turf or the like, such as may be seen in gardens, where they are used for ornament, cultivation, or promenade.

"In those terraces and pleasant walks"—North: Pindar, p. 446.

2. A balcony or open gallery.

"The gunner being upon the terrace of the fort."—Macarty: Foy's, II. 353.

3. The flat roof of a house, as in Oriental and Spanish houses.

"As touching upon galleries and terraces, they were devised by the Greeks."—P. Holland: Plinius, bk. xxv. ch. xxv.

4. A street or row of houses running along the side of a slope; a row of houses; a street.

II. Phys. Geog. & Geol.: A platform, often of soft material, flat above, and more or less steep on the sides.

* tér-raçe, * ter-ass, v.t. [TERRACE, s.] To form into a terrace or terraces; to furnish with a terrace. (Wotton: Architecture, p. 42.)

tér-rae fil-i-ús (pl. tér-rae fil-i-i), s. [Lat. = son of the earth or soil.]

1. A humorous description of a person of obscure birth or low origin.

* 2. A scholar at the university of Oxford, formerly appointed to make satirical speeches, and who often indulged in considerable licence in his treatment of the university authorities.

tér-ra-ma-ra (pl. tér-ra-ma-ré, † tér-ré-ma-ré), s. [Ital.: a form introduced by Signors Strobel and Pigorini, instead of the ordinary forms marna and marniero = mari, and with some reference to marse = a fenny place.]

1. Geol.: An ammoniacal earth, consisting largely of animal remains, from the sites of prehistoric settlements, used as manure in various parts of Italy [2].

"Our country people call this questionable earth terramara, probably a corrupted form of the expression 'terramarna,' but possibly also the genuine ancient name. . . 'terra di mare' (sea-earth), because it was imagined, though incorrectly, to have been a deposit from the sea."—Keller: Lake-Dwellings of Switzerland (Eng. ed.), I. 380.

2. Anthrop.: The name given to certain prehistoric settlements in Northern and Central Italy.

"I asserted that the terramara, those prehistoric settlements, were terrestrial, that in some of them man lived in pile dwellings on dry ground; in others he dwelt in tents and huts."—Strobel, in Keller's Lake-Dwellings of Switzerland (Eng. ed.), I. 307.

* tér-rā-nō-ús, a. [Lat. terra = the earth.]

Bot.: Growing on land.

tér-ra-pín, tér-ra-pēne, * ter-e-bin, s.

[Corrupt. of Algonkin toarebe = a tortoise.]

Zool.: A popular name for the species of Emydidae, which are extensively used for food. They have a depressed head, and the neck can be wholly retracted within the shell; eyes large; beak somewhat resembling that of a bird of prey. They are good swimmers, and live on fish and small reptiles, though in captivity they eat vegetables readily. There are about twenty fresh-water species in the United States, but the most important species is Malacoclemmys palustris, the Diamond-back Salt-water Terrapin, which is highly prized as a delicacy for the table. It is caught in salt marshes along the coast, and commands a very high price.

tér-rā-quē-ús, * tér-rā-quē-an, a. [Lat. terra = earth, and agua = water.] Consisting of land and water, as the globe. (Wordsworth: Inscription upon a Stone.)

"Being overcome declines the rising head, and dashes all the spirits to a dull and low terrenity."—Pelham: Recolles, p. 74.

* tér-rē-ús, a. [Lat. terreus, from terra = earth.] Consisting of earth; earthy.

"The temper of the terreous parts at the bottom."—Brown: Vulgar Errors.

* tér-rēs-í-tý, s. [Lat. terra = earth.] Earthiness.

* tér-rēs-tre (tre ss tér), a. [Lat. terrestris, from terra = earth.] Terrestrial; earthy.

"His paradis terrestris and his disport."—Chaucer: C. T., 5, 138.

tér-rēs-tri-al, a. & s. [Lat. terrestris, from terra = earth.]

A. As adjective:

1. Of or pertaining to the earth; existing on the earth; earthy. (Opposed to celestial.)

"There are also celestial bodies and bodies terrestris."—1 Corinth, xv. 44.

2. Pertaining to or consisting of earth or land, as opposed to water.

"I did not confine these observations to land, or terrestrial parts of the globe."—Woodward.

3. Representing or consisting of the earth.

"But when, from under this terrestrial ball, He tries the proud tops of the eastern pines."—Shakspeare: Richard III., III. 2.

4. Consisting or composed of earth; earthy; solid.

"The terrestrial substance destitute of all liquor, remaineth alone."—P. Holland: Pindar, p. 150.

5. Confined to, inhabiting, or living on the land or ground, as opposed to aquatic, and sometimes to arboreal.

"Terrestrial [brutes] are those, whose only place of rest is upon the earth."—Locke: Nat. Philosophy, ch. 2.

6. Pertaining to the present world; sub-lunary; mundane.

"His kingdom is terrestrial, but mine is celestial."—Ódal: John xviii.

B. As substantive:

1. Ord. Lang.: An inhabitant of the earth; a mortal, as opposed to a celestial.

"But Heaven, that knows what all terrestrials need, Bespoke to night, and toil to day, decreed."—Pope: Homer: Odyssey, XII. 691.

* 2. Zool.: Animals which live on the land, as opposed to those which are aquatic, arboreal, or aerial.

Optics: An eye-piece with three or four lenses, so arranged as to present the image viewed in an erect position; an erecting eye-piece.

terrestrial-globe, s. A spheroid map representing the land, seas, &c., of the world. In contradistinction to the celestial globe, on which the constellations are depicted.

terrestrial-magnetism, s.

Magnetism: Magnetism as exhibited by the earth, which is itself a great natural magnet. [MAGNETISM.]

terrestrial-telescope, s. A telescope differing from the astronomical refracting in having two additional lenses, so as to restore the inverted image to an erect position.

täte, fät, fáre, amidst, whät, fáll, father; wë, wët, bëre, camel, hër, thère; pine, pít, sire, sir, marine; gë, pët, or, wöre, wolf, wörk, whò, sòn; müte, cüb, cüre, unite, sür, rüle, füll; trý, Sýrian. æ, œ = e; ey = ä; qu = kw.

tér-rés-tri-al-ly, adv. [Eng. terrestrial; -ly.] In a terrestrial or earthly manner.

"These plagues seem yet but nourished beneath, And even with man terrestrially to move." Dragon: Moses.

tér-rés-tri-al-nésa, s. [Eng. terrestrial; -ness.] The quality or state of being terrestrial.

tér-rés-tri-fy, v.t. [Lat. terrestris = terrestrial, and facio = to make.] To reduce to earth, or to an earthy or mundane state.

"Though we should affirm, that heaven were but earth enclosed, and earth but heaven terrestrial." — Browne: Vulgar Errors, bk. iv. ch. xiii.

tér-rés-tri-ous, a. [Lat. terrestris.] [TERRESTRIAL.]

- 1. Consisting of earth; earthy.

"A vitriolate or copperas quality, conjoining with a terrestrious or astringent humidity." — Browne: Vulgar Errors, bk. vi, ch. xii.
- 2. Pertaining to the earth; being or living on the earth; terrestrial.

tér-rét, tér-rit, s. [Fr. touret = a small wheel.]

Saddlery: A ring attached to the pad or saddle and hames of harness, through which the driving-reins pass.

"I have always found that, both in tandem and in four-hand, equal power with free play is secured by using terrets on the winkers only." — Field, Sept. 4, 1886.

tér-rib-ly, adv. [Eng. terrible(s); -ly.] To become terrible.

"Even the face of cowards terribilize." Sylvestor: Vocation, 271.

tér-ri-ble, *ter-ry-ble, a. [Fr. terrible, from Lat. terribilis = causing terror; terreo = to terrify; Sp. terrible; Ital. terribile.]

- 1. Causing or tending to cause terror, fear, awe, or dread; formidable, terrifying, frightful, shocking.

"Black it stood as night, Fierce as ten Furies, terrible as hell." Milton: P. L., ll. 671.
- 2. Excessive, extreme; exceedingly great or strong. (Colloq.)

"The imputation of novelty in a terrible charge amongst those who judge of men's heads, as they do of their perukes, by the fashion; and can allow none to be right, but the received doctrines." — Locke: On Human Understanding, Epist. Dod.

¶ For the difference between terrible, fearful, and formidable, see FEARFUL and FORMIDABLE.

tér-ri-ble-nésa, *ter-ri-ble-ness, s. [Eng. terrible; -ness.] The quality or state of being terrible; dreadfulness, formidableness.

"The gloriousness and majesty, and terribleness of his appearance." — Sharp: Sermons, vol. vi, ser. 10.

tér-ri-bly, *ter-ry-blye, adv. [Eng. terrible(s); -ly.]

- 1. In a terrible or terrifying manner; so as to terrify, afright, or awe.

"This fair half round, this ample azure sky, Terribly large, and wonderfully bright." Prior: Solomon, l. 689.
- 2. Exceedingly, extremely, violently; as, I was terribly frightened. (Colloq.) tér-ri-ô-lô, s. pl. [Lat. terra = the earth, and colo = to inhabit.]

Zool.: A sub-order of Oligochaeta (q.v.). Body cylindrical, attenuated at both extremities, without any distinct head or eyes. Several rows of setsae along the body, which serve instead of legs. It contains the Lumbricidae, or Earth-worms.

tér-ri-ô-lous, a. [TERRICOLÆ.]

- 1. Inhabiting the earth; living on the soil of the earth.

"So it appears to be with terricolous worms." — Darwin: Vegetable Mould, p. 217.
- 2. Specifically, of or pertaining to the Terricolæ (q.v.).

tér-ri-ô-la-mént, s. [Lat. terricola-mentum.] A terror; a cause of terror.

"Torments of opinions or terrificaments of expressions." — Gauden: Tears of the Church, p. 198.

tér-ri-ër (1), *ter-rere, *ter-ry-are, s. [For terrier-dog, i.e., a dog which pursues rabbits, &c., into their burrows, from Fr. terrier = the hole or burrow of rabbits, &c., from Low Lat. terrarius = a little hillock, a mound, a burrow, from Lat. terra = earth.]

Zool.: Two breeds of the Dog, the English and the Scotch Terrier. The English Terrier has a good forehead, prominent eyes, a pointed muzzle, and usually short hair; the colour varying, the most common being black and tan, with a tan-coloured spot over the eye. It is used for nethering the fox, and for killing rats, at which latter occupation it is a great adept. The Scotch Terrier, which seems to be of an older stock than its English namesake, has a large head, short, stout legs, and long, rough, shaggy hair. It is of a black and fawn colour, and is intelligent, faithful, and affectionate. The Dandie Dinmont and the Skye Terrier are varieties of the Scotch Terrier. [TOY-TERRIER.]

tér-ri-ër (2), ter-rar, s. [Fr. (papier) terrier = the court-roll, or list of the names of a lord's tenants, from Low Lat. terrarius (liber) = (a book) in which landed property is described; Lat. terra = earth.]

- Law*:
 1. A collection of acknowledgments of the vassals or tenants of a lordship, containing the rents and services they owed to the lord, &c.
 2. A book or roll in which the lands of private persons or corporations are described by their site, boundaries, number of acres, &c.

"We ordain that the archbishops and all bishops within their several dioceses shall procure that a true note and terrier of all the glebes, lands, meadows, gardens, orchards, houses, &c., be taken." — Conon the Eighty Seventh.

tér-ri-ër (3), s. [O. Fr. terriere.] An auger, wimble, or borer.

tér-rif-ic, *tér-rif-ick, a. [Lat. terrificus, from terreo = to frighten, and facio = to make.] Causing terror, fear, or awe; terrific, frightful; inspiring dread or awe.

"He hurries to the realms below, Terrific realms of penal woe." Cooper: Death of the Bishop of Ely.

¶ For the difference between terrific and formidable, see FORMIDABLE.

*tér-rif-ic-al, a. [Eng. terrific; -al.] Terrific.

tér-rif-ic-al-ly, adv. [Eng. terrific(s); -ly.] In a terrific manner; terribly, frightfully.

"The peculiar topography produced by this terrifically upheaving action." — Field, Feb. 17, 1887.

tér-rif-ic-ly, v.t. [Lat. terrifico, from terreo = to frighten, and facio = to make.]

- * 1. To make terrible. (Milton.)
- * 2. To frighten exceedingly; to alarm or shock.

"His high foreheaded foebie feet did alide, And down he fell, with dread of shame sore terrified." Spenser: F. Q., ll. l. ll.

*tér-rif-ic-ous, a. [Lat. terrigena = one born of the earth; terra = earth, and gigno (ps. t. genus) = to bring forth.] Earth-born; produced by or springing from the earth.

†terrogenous-metals, s. pl. The metallic bases of the earths, as aluminium, barium, &c.

tér-ri-tor-ial, *ter-ri-tor-i-all, a. [Eng. territory; -al.]

- 1. Pertaining or relating to territory or land.

"Exchanging her territorial rule for a doubtful suzerainty." — Daily Chronicle, Sept. 23, 1885.
- 2. Limited to a certain district; as, territorial rights.
- 3. Consisting of territory.

"The territorial acquisitions of the East India Company." — Smith: Wealth of Nations, bk. v., ch. iii.
- 4. Possessed of territory, territorized; as, a territorial magnate.

*tér-ri-tor-ial-ize, v.t. [Eng. territorial; -ize.]

- 1. To reduce to the state of a territory.
- 2. To enlarge or extend by the addition of territory.

†tér-ri-tor-ial-ly, adv. [Eng. territorial; -ly.] In regard to territory; by means of territory.

tér-ri-tor-ied, a. [Eng. territory; -ed.] Possessed of territory.

tér-ri-tor-y, *ter-ri-tor-ye, s. [O. Fr. territorie; Fr. territoire, from Lat. territorium = a domain, the land round a town, from terra = earth, land; cf. Port. & Ital. territorio.]

- 1. The extent or compass of land within the jurisdiction or bounds of a particular sovereign state or other body; any separate tract of country as belonging to a state; dominion. Sometimes applied to a domain or tract of land belonging to a private individual.

"The Kingdom of England, over which our municipal laws have jurisdiction, includes not by the common law, either Wales, Scotland, or Ireland, or any other part of the King's dominions, except the territory of England alone." — Blackstone: Comment., § 4. (Introd.)

2. Any large tract of land; a region, a country; as, an unexplored territory.

3. A portion of the country not included within the limits of any state, and not yet admitted as a state into the Union, but organized with a separate legislature, under a territorial government and other officers appointed by the President and Senate of the United States. (Goodrich.)

¶ Both territory and dominion respect a portion of country under a particular government; but the word territory brings to our mind the land which is included; dominion conveys to our minds the power which is exercised; the territory speaks of that which is in its nature bounded; the dominions may be said of that which is boundless. A petty prince has his territory; the monarch of a great empire has dominions. It is the object of every ruler to guard his territory against the irruptions of an enemy; ambitious monarchs are always aiming to extend their dominions.

¶ Territory of a judge: Scots Law: The district over which his jurisdiction extends in causes and in judicial acts proper to him, and beyond which he has no judicial authority.

tér-rô, pref. [Lat. terra = the earth.] (See compound.)

terro-metal, terro-metallic, s. A composition of several alloys, possessing, when baked, peculiar hardness, introduced by Mr. Peeske, a potter, of Burnsett, England. It is principally employed for making tiles of various kinds.

tér-rôr, *tér-rour, s. [Fr. terreur, from Lat. terrorem, accus. of terro = dread, terror; terreo = to be afraid, to tremble; cf. Spanc. trus = to tremble, to be afraid; trása = terror; Sp. & Port. terror; Ital. terrore.]

- 1. Fear which agitates extremely the body and mind; extreme fear, alarm, or dread, fright.

"Terror is that species of fear, which rouses to defend or escape; producing the violent actions which have been already noticed." — Cogin: On the Passions, ch. ii, § 3.
- 2. That which excites or may excite dread; a cause of fear or alarm.

"Rulers are not a terror to good works, but to the evil." — Romans xiii, 3.

¶ Darwin (Descent of Man, ch. iii.) shows that terror acts on the lower animals in the same way as on man, causing the muscles to tremble, the heart to palpitate, the sphincters to be relaxed, and the hair to stand on end.

¶ (1) King of terrors: Death.

"His confidence shall be rooted out of his tabernacle, and it shall bring him to the king of terrors." — Job xviii, 14.

(2) Reign of terror: [REIGN, s., ¶.]

*terror-breathing, a. Inspiring terror; terrifying.

"For which Rome sends her curse out from far, Through the stern throat of terror-breathing war." Drayton: Mortimer to Queen Isabel.

*terror-haunted, a. Haunted with terrifying objects or appearances.

"Till at length the lays they chanted Reached the chamber terror-haunted." Longfellow: Norman Baron.

terror-smitten, a. Struck or affected with terror; terrified, terror-struck.

terrorism; specifically, an agent or partizan of the revolutionary tribunal during the reign of terror in France.

"Like the Terrorists of '94, who, having begun by beheading princes and nobles, ended by sending artisans and shopgirls to the guillotine."—Daily Telegraph, Jan. 2, 1886.

tér-rór-ize, tэр-rór-ize, v.t. [Eng. terror; -ize, -ise.] To impress with terror or fear; to sway or impel by terror; to force by intimidation to a certain course.

"Ministers, we feel sure, will neither be terrorized nor cajoled into offering any measure affecting either the local or local government."—Daily Telegraph, March 4, 1887.

*tэр-rór-léss, a. [Eng. terror; -less.]

- 1. Free from terror.
2. Unalarming; without the will or ability to inspire terror.

"Render him terrorless."—E. A. Poe: Silenus, II. 20.

tэр-rý, s. [Fr. tirer = to draw.]

- 1. Rope-making: An open reel.
2. Fabric: A pile fabric, such as plush or velvet; probably from the drawing out of the wires over which the warp is laid to make the series of loops seen in Brussels carpet or uncut velvet.

"Silk gauze with terry or sheeny silk."—Daily Telegraph, Oct. 6, 1885.

terry-velvet, s. A silk plush, or ribbed velvet.

tэрse, a. [Lat. tersus, prop. pa. par. of tergo = to wipe, to rub off, to polish.]

"I. Lit.: Wiped or rubbed; appearing wiped or rubbed; polished, smooth.

"Many stones precious and vulgar, although terse and smooth, have not this power attractive."—Erasmus: Fulgar Errours.

II. Figuratively:

- *1. Refined, accomplished, polished. (Said of persons.)
2. Free from superfluities; neatly or elegantly concise; neat and concise.

"His despatches, which are still extant, and which are models of official writing, terse, perspicuous, full of important facts and weighty reasons, compressed into the smallest possible number of words."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xiv.

tэрse-lý, *terce-ly, adv. [Eng. terse; -ly.]

In a terse manner; neatly and concisely, succinctly and elegantly.

"Understand him not, that one so infirm with age, or decrepit in years, but that one living in so ignorant and superstitious a generation, could write so tersely."—Pulter: Worthies; Lincolnshire.

tэрse-néss, s. [Eng. terse; -ness.]

- *1. Lit.: Smoothness.
"The cylindrical figure of the mole, as well as the compactness of its form, arising from the terseness of its limbs, proportionally lessens its labour."—Paley: Natural Theology, ch. xv.
2. The quality or state of being terse; neatness or conciseness of style; brevity combined with elegance.

"That is an American locution, but it is expressive with tolerable terseness of the general aspect of the river Yarra Yarra."—Daily Telegraph, Sept. 29, 1885.

tэр-tial (ti as shí), a. & s. [Lat. tertius = third, from tres = three.]

Ornithology:

A. As adj.: Of or belonging to the tertiaries.

B. As subst.: One of the tertiary feathers; a tertiary (q.v.).

tэр-tian (ti as shí), *ter-tiane, *ter-clan, a. & s. [Fr. tertiane = a tertian ague, from Lat. tertiana = a tertian fever; prop. fem. sing. of tertianus = tertian, belonging to the third; tertius = third; tres = three.]

A. As adj.: Occurring or recurring every third day.

"A tertian ague is at least your lot." Dryden: Cock & Fox, 182.

B. As substantive:

- 1. A fever or other disease whose paroxysms recur every other day; an intermittent fever, &c., whose paroxysms occur after intervals of about forty-eight hours.
*2. A measure of eighty-four gallons, the third part of a tun.
3. A curve of the third degree.

tertian-ague, s. [AGUE, II. 1.]

tэр-ti-a-rý (ti as shí), a. & s. [Lat. tertiarus = prop. containing a third part, now considered as meaning, belonging to the third.]

A. As adjective:

1. Ord. Lang.: Of the third order, rank, or formation; third.

2. Eccles.: Of, belonging to, or connected with a Third Order (q.v.).

"Thus arose various congregations of tertiary monks and nuns—in Lombardy, Sicily, Dalmatia, France, Spain, and Portugal."—Addis & Arnold: Cath. Diet., p. 792.

B. As substantive:

I. Ord. Lang.: That which is tertiary or third in order, succession, or formation.

II. Technically:

1. Art: A colour, as citrine, russet, or olive, produced by the mixture of two secondary colours. More correctly speaking, they are grays, and are either red-gray, blue-gray, or yellow-gray, when these primaries are in excess, or they are violet-gray, orange-gray, or green-gray, when these secondaries are in excess.

2. Eccles.: A member of a Third Order (q.v.), whether living in the world or in community. "Many tertiaries, in course of time... desired to take solemn vows."—Addis & Arnold: Cath. Diet., p. 792.

3. Geology:

(1) Of strata: The third leading division of fossiliferous sedimentary rocks. Called also the Cainozoic or Kainozoic. The succession and importance of the Primary (Palaeozoic) and the Secondary (Mesozoic) rocks were understood before the nature and extent of the Tertiary were recognised, these last strata being confounded with the superficial alluviums. [SUPRACRETACEOUS.] They were observed to occur in patches (some of freshwater and others of marine origin) in small areas or basins in the Secondary rocks, suggesting the idea that they had been deposited in bays, lakes, estuaries, or inland seas, after a great part of the earth's surface had been converted into dry land. The first properly understood strata of Tertiary age were those in the vicinity of Paris, described by Cuvier and Brongniart in 1810. Other Tertiary strata were shortly afterwards discriminated in London, in Hampshire, in Suffolk, in the Subapennine hills in Italy, near Bordeaux and Dax in the South of France, and elsewhere. These several deposits were found to be not quite contemporaneous, and there arose a division, which continued till 1833, into the Lower, Middle, and Upper Tertiary. But as early as 1828, Mr. (afterwards Sir Charles) Lyell had conceived the idea that the Tertiary strata might be classified by the percentage of extinct species of shells which they contained. He found, in 1829, that Deshayes, of Paris, had independently come to the same conclusion, and the latter geologist, after comparing 3,000 fossil with 5,000 living shells, intimated that in the Lower Tertiary strata about 34 per cent. of the species were identical with recent ones; in the Middle Tertiary about 17 per cent.; in the Upper Tertiary, in the oldest beds 35 to 50, and in the more modern ones 90 to 95 per cent. To these three Lyell gave the names Eocene, Miocene, and Pliocene respectively, words which have since gained universal currency. The foregoing percentages are now known to be only approximately accurate. Next the newer Pliocene beds were called by Lyell Pleistocene (q.v.), a name afterwards transferred to the Post Tertiary, and Oligocene (q.v.) was proposed by Beyrich for beds intercalated between the Eocene and the Miocene. A gap, as yet only partially filled, occurs between the Chalk and the Eocene. This gap has been utilised to draw a natural line between the Secondary and the Tertiary beds. It probably arose from an upheaval of the sea-bed. Thus, with the Eocene, as the name imports, the dawn of the present system of things began, and the percentage of shell-species shows that the transition has gone on without stoppage or hiatus till now. [QUATERNARY, RECENT.] In the United States marine Tertiary strata occur somewhat sparingly along the borders of the Atlantic, and in the states bordering the Gulf; also in the Pacific States. But the greatest and most important development occurs to the Rocky Mountain region, comprising great lacustrine deposits, the silted-up beds of former lakes of immense extent. These deposits are remarkable for their richness in fossil remains, many of them types of former remarkable mammals, which have gone far to fill up the gap in the story of animal evolution. Among these may be named the successive forms of the equine type, from its four and five-toed ancestors down to the one-toed modern horse.

(2) Of time: The period of time during which the Tertiary strata were deposited. It cannot yet be measured even approximately. When it commenced, England, as proved by the fruits in the London Clay at Silleppey, was a tropical or sub-tropical country. The temperature fell till the Newer Pliocene, by which time the climate was semi-arctic. [GLACIAL PERIOD.] During the deposition of the Tertiary, there was a great increase of land both in Europe and America.

4. Ornith. (Pl.): The tertial; wing-feathers having their origin from the humerus. They are a portion of the quills. They are not scapulars, though Cuvier calls them by this name; nor do they cover the scapulars. Their use is to fill up the interval between the body and the expanded wing, and to oppose a broader surface of resistance to the air.

tertiary-alcohols, s. pl.

Chem.: Alcohols in which hydroxyl is united to a carbon atom, which is united to three other carbon atoms.

tertiary-colours, s. pl.

Art: Colours produced by the mixture of two secondary colours, as citrine, russet, or olive. (TERTIARY, B. II. 1.)

tēsĉh-ō-mach'-ēr-ite, s. [After E. F. Tschernacher, who first announced it; suff. -ite (Min.)]

Min.: A native carbonate of ammonia, occurring both in crystals and massive in guano deposits. Crystall system not ascertained. Hardness, 1.5; sp. gr. 1.45; colour, yellowish to white. Compos.: ammonia, 32.9; carbonic acid, 55.7; water, 11.4 = 100, yielding the formula $\frac{1}{4}\text{NH}_4\text{O} + \frac{1}{4}\text{H}_2\text{CO}_3$.

tēsĉh-in-ite, tēsĉh-ĕn-ite, s. [After Teschin or Teachen, Moravia, where first found; suff. -ite (Petrol.)]

Petrol.: A rock consisting of variable proportions of a feldspar, fresh nepheline, augite, and hornblende, with some ilmenite and apatite.

Tēsĉh-ō La'-ma, s. [See def.]

Compar. Relig.: The abbot of the great monastery at Krashis Lumpo; one of the great Lamas, the other being the Dalai Lama, who has the political supremacy. When either dies it is necessary for the other to ascertain in whose body the celestial being whose outward form has been dissolved has been placed again to incarnate himself. For that purpose the names of all the male children born just after the death of the deceased Grand Lama are laid before his survivor, who chooses three out of the whole number. Their names are inscribed on tablets and put into a casket, whence one is selected by the abbot of the great monasteries to fill the place of the dead Lama. The Tesho Lama is often called Pantshen Kimpotshe (the Glorious Teacher).

tēs-sar-a-dēc'-ād, s. [Gr. tēsares (tesares) = four, and dēka (dēka) = ten.] A group of fourteen individuals; an aggregate of fourteen.

"Some of the tesserae work of the Romans has lately been dug up.—Sir R. Atkins: History of Gloucester, (1712).

tēs-sēr-al, a. [Lat. tessera = a square, a die, a cube.]

1. Ord. Lang.: Pertaining to or containing tesserae; tessellated.

2. Crystall.: Related to the tesseral or cubic system.

tesseral-system, s.

Crystall.: The Cubic-system (q.v.).

tēs-sēr-ār-ī-an, a. [Lat. tessera = a die.] Of or pertaining to gambling; as, the tessera-orian art.

tēs-sū-lar, a. [TESSELAR.]

Crystall.: Relating to the cube or having equal axes like the cube; tesseral.

tēt (t), tēste, s. [O. Fr. test (Fr. têt) = a test; O. Fr. teste = a skull; Fr. tête = a head; Lat. testa = a piece of dried clay, a tile, a brick.]

I. Ordinary Language:

*1. A potsherd.

"Then was the teste or potsherd, the brass, gold, & silver reduced into dust."—Joye's Exposition of Daniel, ch. ii.

2. A vessel used in refining gold and silver; a cupel (q.v.).

3. Examination by the cupel; hence, any critical trial and examination; trial.

"Thou hast strangely stood the test."—Shakspeare: Tempest, iv.

4. A means of trial; as, To offer money as a test of one's integrity.

*5. Testimony, evidence.

"To which this is no proof, Without more wiles and more overt test."—Shakspeare: Othello, i. 3.

6. That with which anything is compared for proof of genuineness; a standard.

"At once the source, and end, and test of art."—Pope: Essay on Criticism, 73.

7. Means of discrimination; ground of admission or exclusion.

"Our penal laws no sons of yours admit, Our test excludes your tribe from benefit."—Dryden: Hind & Panther, iii. 630.

*8. Judgment, discrimination, distinction.

"Who could excel, when few can make a test Betwixt indifferent writing and the best?"—Dryden: Total.

9. An apparatus for proving petroleum and similar hydrocarbon oils by ascertaining the temperature at which they evolve explosive vapours.

II. Technically:

1. Bot.: [TESTA.]

2. Chem.: Any substance employed to bring about a chemical change in a compound, with the view of detecting one or more of its constituents. The change may be one of colour, precipitation, heat, evolution of gas, &c. This term is also sometimes applied to examination by the polariscope and blow-pipe, thus: the polariscope-test, the blow-pipe-test. [REAGENT.]

3. Metall.: A cupelling-heap used in a refining-furnace where lead is separated from silver on a large scale. The test is an oval iron frame containing a basin-shaped mass of powdered bone-ash, which is brought to a consistence by a solution of pearl-ash. The test is fixed as a cupelling-heap in the reverberatory furnace, and is subjected to a blast from a tuyere, which removes the floating oxide of silver and furnishes oxygen for its elimination from the alloy under treatment.

4. Sugar-man: The proof or condition of a syrup.

5. Zoology:

- (1) The shell of any of the Mollusca.
- (2) The calcareous case of Echinodermata.
- (3) The thick leathery tunic of Tunicata.
- (4) The shell immersed in the sarcodae of a Foraminifer.

Test Act, s.

English History:

1. An Act passed in 1563 by which an oath of allegiance to Queen Elizabeth, and of abjuration of the temporal authority of the Pope, was exacted from all holders of office, lay or spiritual, within the realm, except peers.

"But the Test Act placed the magistracy in Protestant hands, and, as Elizabeth passed from indifference to suspicion, and from suspicion to terror, she no longer chose to restrain the bigotry around her."—Green: Short History, p. 401.

2. An Act, 2 Car. II., c. 2, passed in 1678, by which it was enacted that all persons holding any important office, civil or military, under the crown, or receiving money therefrom, should take the oath of allegiance and supremacy, subscribe a declaration against transubstantiation, and receive the sacrament of the Lord's Supper, according to the usage of the Established Church. It was repealed in 1828, by 9 Geo. IV., c. 17.

test-cock, s.

Steam-eng.: A small cock fitted to the top or bottom of a cylinder for clearing it of water.

test-furnace, s.

Metall.: One form of refining furnace for treating argentiferous alloy, such as that of lead rich in silver.

test-glass, s. A glass vessel of conical or cylindrical form, having a foot and sometimes a beak; used for holding chemical solutions.

test-lines, s. pl.

Microscopy (Pl.): The lines on a test-plate (q.v.). Generally called, from their inventor, Nobert's test-lines.

test-mixer, s. A tall cylindrical bottle having a wide foot and provided with a stopper. It is graduated into 100 or more equal parts, commencing at the bottom, and is used in preparing test-alkalies, test-acids, and similar solutions, by diluting them down to the required strength.

test-object, s.

Microscopy (Pl.): Microscopic objects used to determine the value of object glasses; that is, to determine their magnifying, defining, and penetrating power, and their corrective adaptation.

test-paper, s.

1. Chem.: Unsized paper dipped into an alcoholic solution of a vegetable colouring matter, which changes colour when exposed to the action of an acid or alkaline solution. [LITMUS-PAPER, TURMERIC-PAPER.]

2. Law: An instrument admitted as a standard of comparison for handwriting.

test-plate, s.

1. Chem.: A glass slip used in stirring tests.

2. Microscopy: A finely-ruled glass plate used in testing the power and defining quality of microscopes.

test-pump, s. A force-pump for testing the strength of boilers, tubes, and other hollow articles by hydraulic pressure. It is provided with a gauge for showing the pressure in pounds applied to the square inch.

test-spoon, s. A small spoon used for taking up small quantities of powders, fluxes, &c. Used in blow-pipe or chemical experiments. The handle may be used as a spatula.

test-stirrer, s. A round glass rod, having one end pointed for dropping tests, and the other end rounded.

test-tube, s.

1. Chem.: A narrow tube from three to six inches in length, closed at one end, made of very thin glass, and furnished with a smooth lip.

2. A chlorometer (q.v.).

bōil, bōy; pōut, jōwl; cat, çell, chorus, çhin, bençh; go, çom; thin, this; sin, aç; expect, Xenophon, exist. -îng. -çdan, -tian = shan. -tion, -sion = shün; -çion, -çion = zhün. -çious, -tious, -çious = shüs. -ble, -dle, &c. = bel, del.

* tēst (2), s. [Lat. testis = a witness.]

1. A witness.

"Who were for the more sureties testes of that deed." —Berners: Froissart; Cronicle, vol. II, ch. col.

2. Inspection, oversight, superintendence.

"In his publication he urged the notoriety of the fact as a thing not feigned, not private, but done at noon day under the test of competent persons." —Dr. Taylor: State of Conscience, bk. I, ch. iv.

tēst (1), v.t. [TEST (1), a.]

I. Ord. Lang.: To put to the test; to try; to prove the genuineness or truth of by experiment, or by some fixed principle or standard; to compare with a standard.

II. Technically:

1. Chem.: To examine by the application of some reagent.

2. Metall.: To refine as gold or silver, by means of lead, in a test, by the destruction, vitrification, or scorification of all extraneous matter.

tēst (2), v.t. & t. [Lat. testor = to bear witness, to testify, to attest; testis = a witness.]

A. Trans.: To attest and date: as, A document tested on such and such a day.

B. Intrans.: To make a will or testament. (Scotch.) tēs-tā (pl. tēs-tāe), s. [Lat. = a brick, a tile, a shell.]

Bot.: The integuments of a seed, or the outer integument as distinguished from the inner one, or tegmen. Called also the Primine (q.v.).

tēst-a-ble, a. [Lat. testabilis, from testor = to testify, to publish one's will.]

Law:

1. Capable of being devised or given by will.

2. Capable of witnessing or of being witnessed.

† tēs-tā-çē-a (or ç as sh), s. pl. [Neut. pl. of Lat. testaceus = covered with a shell, testaceous, from testa = a shell.]

Zool.: A term formerly used as approximately equivalent to the more modern Conchifera (q.v.). Linnæus made the Testacea an order of his class Vermes, and Cuvier applied the term to a division of his Acephala (q.v.).

tēs-tā-çē-an (or çean as shan), a. & s. [TESTACEA.]

A. As adj.: Of or relating to the Testacea.

B. As subst.: Any individual belonging to the Testacea (q.v.).

tēs-tā-çē-lā, s. [Mod. Lat., dimin. from testa (q.v.).]

Zool. & Palæont.: A genus of Limacidae (q.v.), with three recent species, from the south of Europe, the Canary Isles, and Britain. Shell small and ear-shaped, placed at hinder extremity of the body, which is elongated, broadest behind, tapering towards the head. The species are subtanean in habit, feeding on earthworms, and visiting the surface only at night. During the winter and in long periods of drought they form a sort of cocoon in the ground by the exudation of mucus; as if this be broken away the animal may be seen in its thin, opaque, white mantle, which rapidly contracts till it extends but a little way beyond the margin of the shell. Fossil species two, from Tertiary strata.

tēs-tā-çē-ōg-ra-phŷ, tēs-tā-çē-ōl-ō-gŷ, s. [Mod. Lat. testacea, and Gr. γράφω (graphō) = to write, or λόγος (logos) = a word, a discourse.] The science of testaceous molluscs; conchology.

tēs-tā-çē-ōūs (or çeous as shūs), a. [TESTACEA.]

I. Ord. Lang.: Pertaining to shells; consisting of a hard shell; having a hard continuous shell.

"Several shells were found upon the shores, of the crustaceous and testaceous kind." —Woodward: Nat. Hist.

II. Bot. & Entom.: Brownish-yellow, the colour of unglazed earthenware.

† testaceous-animals, s. pl.

Zool.: Animals with shells typically of a strong kind, as in the oyster, as distinguished from crustaceous shells, which are thinner and articulated, as in the lobster. Spec., the Testacea (q.v.).

* testaceous-medicines, testaceous-powders, s. pl.

Pharm.: Medicines or powders prepared from the shells of testaceous animals.

tēst-a-çŷ, s. [Eng. testate; -çy.]

Law: The state or condition of being testate, or of leaving a valid testament or will at death.

tēst-a-mēt, s. [Fr., from Lat. testamentum = a thing declared, a last will, from testor = to be a witness, to testify; testis = a witness; Sp., Port., and Ital. testamento.]

1. Law: A solemn authentic instrument in writing, by which a person declares his will as to the disposal of his property after his death; a will (q.v.). When drawn by a solicitor, it commences with the formula: (This is the last will and testament of . . .

"Every person has full power and liberty to make a will, that is not under some special prohibition by law or custom, which prohibitions are principally upon three accounts: for want of sufficient discretion; for want of sufficient liberty and free will; and on account of their criminal conduct. No testament is of any effect till after the death of the testator; and hence it follows that testaments may be made three ways: (1) If made by a person labouring under any of the incapacities before mentioned; (2) by making another testament of a later date; and (3) by cancelling or revoking it. For, though I make a last will and testament irrevocable in the strongest words, yet I am at liberty to revoke it: because my own act or words cannot alter the disposition of law, so as to make that irrevocable which is in its own nature revocable; (4) marriage also is an express revocation of a prior will." —Blackstone: Comment., bk. II, ch. 28.

2. U. S. Law: In the United States the general principles of the law relating to wills are chiefly of English origin, though in the different states there are varying provisions as to the forms requisite in making a will, the appointment of executors, &c. There are also varied requirements concerning signature, and the steps necessary to revoke a will, or to make changes in its provisions. Registry is necessary, the will being held subject to examination. In Scotland a testament can only convey personal or movable property. To convey real-estate the will must have the form of a deed having a present operation.

3. Biblical Criticism, Theol., & Ord. Lang.: The rendering of Gr. διαθήκη (diathēkē) = a will; s covenant, applied to the Old and New Testaments, which in the opinion of Protestants together constitute the whole Bible. [BIBLE, A. 3.] Sometimes the word Testament is used alone, when it means the New as distinguished from the Old Testament.

tēst-a-mēt-al, a. [Eng. testament; -al.]

*tēs-tū-dīn-al, a. [Lat. testudo, genit. testudinis; Eng. adj. suff. -al.] Pertaining to or resembling the tortoise.

*tēs-tū-dīn-ār-i-a, s. [Mod. Lat. testudinarius = tortoise-like. So named from the resemblance which the great rugged, cracked root of the plant bears to the shell of a tortoise.]

Bot.: Elephant's-foot or Hottentot's-bread. A genus of Diocoreacea, akin to Dioscorea, but with the seeds winged only at the tip, instead of all round. Rootstock above ground sometimes four feet in diameter. Stems occasionally forty feet long; flowers small, greenish-yellow. Testudinaria elephantipes is the Common Elephant's-foot or Hottentot's-bread. The rootstock is a large, fleshy mass, covered with a thick bark, cracked deeply in every direction. The Hottentots in time of scarcity made use of the fleshy inside of the root as a kind of yam.

*tēs-tū-dīn-ār-i-ō-us, a. [Mod. Lat. testudinarius (a); Eng. adj. suff. -ous.] Resembling a tortoise-shell in colour; marked with black, red, and yellow patches, like tortoise-shell.

† tēs-tū-dī-nā-ta, s. pl. [Neut. pl. of Lat. testudinatus = arched, vaulted, from testudo, genit. testudinis = a tortoise.]

Zool.: A synonym of Chelonia (q.v.). It was introduced by Klein and adopted by Agassiz.

*tēs-tū-dīn-āt-ōd, *tēs-tū-dīn-ate, a. [TESTUDINATA.] Shaped like the back of a tortoise; arched, vaulted.

*tēs-tū-dīn-ō-ō-us, a. [Lat. testudineus.] Resembling the shell of a tortoise.

*tēs-tū-dīn-ī-dōe, s. pl. [Lat. testudo, genit. testudinis (s); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -idae.]

1. Zool.: Land-tortoises; a family of Chelonia, very widely distributed in both hemispheres, but absent from Australia. The carapace is very convex; claws blunt; feet club-shaped, adapted for progression on land only; neck retractile. They are vegetable-feeders, and the greater part of the species belong to the type-genus Testudo (q.v.). In some classifications the family includes the fresh-water Tortoises, now generally made a separate family of Emydidae (q.v.).

2. Palæont.: The family appears in the Miocene of Europe and the Eocene of North America. [COLOSSOCHELVA.]

*tēs-tū-dō, s. [Lat. = a tortoise, a testudo, from testa = a shell.]

1. Roman Antiq.: A cover or screen used in assaults upon fortified towns, in cases where the town was of small size and accessible on every side, while the force at the disposal of the besiegers was large. A ring of soldiers was drawn round the walls, a portion of whom kept up a constant discharge of missiles upon those who manned the battlements, while the rest, advancing on every side simultaneously, with their shields joined above their heads so as to form a continuous covering like the shell of a tortoise (testudine facta), planted scaling-ladders against a number of different points, and, at the same time, endeavoured to burst open the gates. Also applied to a movable structure, on wheels or rollers, used to protect sappers.

2. Mining: A shelter similar in shape and design employed as a defence for miners, &c., when working in ground or rock which is liable to cave in.

3. Med.: An encysted tumour, from a supposed resemblance to the shell of a tortoise.

4. Music: A name applied to a species of lyre, because, according to the legend recounted at full length in the Homeric hymn, the frame of the first lyre was formed by Hermes out of the shell of a tortoise.

5. Zool.: Tortoise (q.v.); the type-genus of Testudinidae (q.v.), with twenty-five species. Most abundant in the Ethiopian region, but also extending over the Oriental region into the south of Europe and the Eastern States of North America. Thorax convex, rather globular, and solid; breastbone solid, with twelve shields, those of the throat separated; five toes on fore feet, four on the hinder pair.

TESTUDO.

6. Palæont.: The genus appears first in the Eocene of North America.

1. Ord. Lang.: A prefix used in compounds derived from the Greek, and signifying four, fourfold. Abbreviated to tetr- before a vowel.

2. Chem.: A prefix applied to compounds containing four atoms of a chlorous or one atom of a basyous element, e.g., tetrachloride of tin, SnCl₄. It is also applied to substitution compounds, in which four atoms of hydrogen are replaced by a radicle.

tēt-ra-brānch, s. [TETRABRANCHIATA.] Any individual of the Tetrabranchiata. (Woodward: Mollusca (ed. Tate), p. 183.)

tēt-ra-brān-chī-ā-ta, s. pl. [Pref. tetra-, and Mod. Lat. branchiata (q.v.).]

1. Zool.: An order of Cephalopoda, comprising three families: Nautilidae, Orthoceratidae, and Ammonitidae, though in some recent classifications the second family is merged in the first. Animal creeping, protected by an external shell; head retractile within the mantle; eyes pedunculated; mandibles calcareous; arms very numerous; body attached to shell by adductor muscles and by a continuous horny girdle; branchiae four; funnel formed by the union of two lobes which do not constitute a distinct tube. Shell external, in the form of an extremely elongated cone, either straight or variously folded or coiled, many-chambered, subnucled; the inner layers and septa nacreous, the outer layers porcellanous.

2. Palæont.: They attained their maximum in the Palæozoic period, decreasing from that time onward, and being represented at the present by the single genus Nautilus (q.v.). The Nautilidae proper and Orthoceratidae are pre-eminently Palæozoic, while the Ammonitidae are almost exclusively Mesozoic.

tēt-ra-brān-chī-ate, a. [TETRABRANCHIATA.] Having four gills.

tē-trāc'-ēr-a, s. [TETRACEROS.]

Bot.: A genus of Delimce (q.v.), owing its scientific name to the fact that its four capsules are recurved like horns. Shrubs or small trees, often climbing, with alternate, stalked, fester-nerved, naked leaves, often rough above, and panicle or racemose inflorescence. A decoction of Tetracera Breginziana and T. oblongata is given in Brazil in swelling of the legs. T. Yagarea is diaphoretic, diuretic, and antisyphilitic.

tē-trāc'-ēr-ōs, a. [Gr. τετρακερος (tetrakerōs) = four-horned; τετρα- (tetra-) = four, and κερας (keras) = a horn.]

Zool.: A genus of Bovidae, sub-family Cephalophine, with two species, from the hilly parts of India; rare north of the Ganges. Horns four, straight and conical; in one species the anterior pair rudimentary. [CHIKARAB.]

tēt-ra-chō'-nī-ūm, s. [Pref. tetr(a), and Mod. Lat. achenium (q.v.).]

Bot.: A fruit formed by the adhesion of four achenes.

tēt-ra-chlōr-ō-va-lēr'-īo, a. [Pref. tetra-; chlōrō-, and Eng. valeric.] [QUADRACHLOBO-VALERIC.]

tēt-ra-chord, s. [Gr. τετραχορδον (tetrachordon), from τέτρα- (tetra-), and χορδή (chordē) = a string, a chord; Fr. tetrachorde.]

Music:

1. A scale-series of four notes. The word in its modern sense signifies a half of the octave scale, e.g., from c to f, or from g to c. The position of the tones and semitones is similar in both tetrachords. A third tetrachord placed above these two would lead into the key of g, and another into the key of d. The fundamental system in ancient music was the tetrachord, or system of four sounds, of which the extreme were at an interval of a fourth.

* 2. A lyre with four strings.

"Tetrapender . . . substituted the seven-stringed cithara for the old tetrachord."—Donaldson: Theatre of the Greeks, p. 81.

¶ (1) Conjunct tetrachords: Tetrachords which overlap, as c to f, and f to b.

(2) Disjunct tetrachords: Tetrachords which have a degree between them, as c to f, and g to c. Similar disjunct tetrachords necessarily pass through the whole key-series, and a combination of conjunct and disjunct tetrachords is required to form a diatonic scale of more than one octave in compass.

tēt-ra-chord'-al, a. [Eng. tetrachord; -al.] Of or pertaining to tetrachordia; formed of tetrachords.

tetrachordal-system, s.

Music: The early form of the system now known as Tonic Sol-fa (q.v.).

tēt-ra-chor'-dōn, s. [TETRACHORD.]

Music: An instrument similar in appearance to a cottage pianoforte, and like it played by finger-board, but the tone, instead of being produced by striking, is obtained by means of a cylinder of india-rubber charged with resin, kept in motion by a pedal, variety of tone being gained by the depth of pressure on the keys by the fingers. It is called the tetrachordon from an idea that its sounds are similar to those produced by a string quartet. The instrument is constructed also with self-acting machinery.

¶ Milton used the word as the title of one of his treatises on marriage, occasioned by his disagreement with his wife, Mary Powell. He explained the word in the sub-title: "Expositions upon the Four Chief Places of Scripture which treat of Marriage."

tēt-ra-chōt'-ō-mōus, a. [Gr. τέτραχος (tetrachos) = fourfold, and τομή (tomē) = a cutting.]

1. Gr. Antig.: Persons who were born on the fourth day of the month, which was reputed to be lucky.

2. Church History (in this sense probably directly from Gr. τέτρα- (tetra-), in comp. = four):

(1) Heretics who fasted at Easter, as on Wednesday.
(2) Certain ancient sects who held the number four in special reverence, to the extent of supposing the existence of a fourth person added to the Trinity.

tēt-ṛā-drāchm (ch silent), tēt-ṛā-drāch-mā, s. [Gr. τετραδραχμον (tetradrachmon), from τέτρα (tetra-) = fourfold, and δραχμή (drachmē) = a drachm.]

Gr. Coin.: An ancient silver coin, value four drachmas, or about 3s. 3d. sterling.

tēt-trād-ŷm-īte, s. [Gr. τετραδύμος (tetradymos) = fourfold, quadruple; suff. -īte (Min.).]

Mineralogy:

1. A rhombohedral mineral found sometimes in crystals, but more frequently granular, massive, or foliated, often with auriferous ore. Hardness, 1.5 to 2; sp. gr. 7.2 to 7.9; lustre, bright metallic; colour, pale steel-gray; somewhat sectile, in thin laminae, flexible; soils paper. Compos.: somewhat variable, but consists principally of bismuth and tellurium. Dana divides as follows: (a) Free from sulphur, with formula Bi₂Te₃; (b) Sulphurous, with formula Bi₂(Te + S)₃; and (c) Seleniferous.

2. The same as JOSEITE (q.v.).

3. The same as WEHLITE (q.v.).

tēt-trād-ŷm-ōūs, a. [Gr. τετραδύμος (tetradymos), a.]

Bot.: Having four cells or cases.

tēt-ṛā-dŷ-nā-mī-a, s. pl. [Pref. tetra-, and Gr. δύνamis (dynamis) = might, strength, referring to four stamens being longer than the others.]

Bot.: The fifteenth class in Linnaeus's Artificial System. Plants with six stamens, four long and two short. Orders, Siliculeosa and Siliquosa.

tēt-ṛā-dŷ-nā-mī-an, tēt-ṛā-dŷ-nā-mōūs, a. [TETRADYNAMIA.]

Botany:

1. (Of stamens): Six in number, four long and two short.

2. (Of a plant): Having six stamens, four long and two short; of or belonging to the Tetradynamia (q.v.).

tēt-ṛā-ō-drāl, tēt-ṛā-ō-drōn, s. [TETRAHEDRAL, TETRAHEDRON.]

tēt-trāg-na-tha, s. [Lat. tetragnathus = a kind of spider; Gr. τετραγνάθος (tetragnathos) = having four jaws, spec. used of a kind of spider.]

Zool.: A genus of Epeiridae. Tetragnatha extensa is a British spider, about half an inch long, frequenting damp places. It has long, diverging falcis, and the legs extended before and behind, nearly in a line with the body.

tēt-ṛā-gōn, s. [Fr. tetragone = having four angles or corners, from Lat. tetragonus; Gr. τετραγώνος (tetragōnos), from τέτρα- (tetra-) = fourfold, and γωνία (gōniā) = an angle, from γώνω (gōnō) = a knee.]

1. Geom.: A figure having four angles, and consequently four sides, as a square, a rhombus; a quadrangle.

2. Astrol.: An aspect of two planets with regard to the earth when they are distant from each other 90°, or the fourth of a circle.

tēt-trāg-ōn-al, a. [Eng. tetragon; -al.]

1. Geom.: Pertaining to a tetragon; having four angles or sides, as a square, a parallelogram, &c.; four-sided, quadrangular.

2. Astrol.: In position of a tetragon; distant 90° from each other.

"Reckoning on onto the seventh day, the moon will be in a tetragonal or quadrat aspect, that is, four signs removed from that wherein the disease began."—Broune: Vulgar Errours, bk. iv., ch. xii.

3. Bot.: Four-cornered, angular; used of some ovaries, the stems of the Labiatae, &c.

4. Crystall.: [TETRAGONAL-SYSTEM.]

tetragonal-system, a.

Crystall.: A system of crystallization in which the lateral axes are equal, being the diameters of a square, while the vertical is either longer or shorter than the lateral. Called also the Dimetric, Monadimetric, or Pyramidal System. (Dana.)

tēt-trāg-ōn-al-lŷ, adv. [Eng. tetragonal; -ly.] In a tetragonal or four-cornered manner.

tēt-ṛā-gō-nē-æ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. tetragonia (a); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -æ.]

Bot.: The typical sub-order of Tetragoniaceæ. The fruit is woody and indehiscent.

tēt-ṛā-gō-nī-a, s. [Gr. τετραγώνια (tetragōniā) = the spindle-tree: τέτρα- (tetra-) and γωνία (gōniā) = a corner, an angle.]

Bot.: The typical genus of Tetragoniaceæ (q.v.). Chiefly littoral plants with alternate, stalked, fleshy leaves, and apetalous flowers, having four to twelve stamens and three to eight short styles. Nearly all the species from the Southern Hemisphere. Tetragonia expansa, a native of New Zealand, is called New Zealand spinach, and is cultivated in Europe as a substitute for spinach itself.

tēt-ṛā-gō-nī-ā-ḡ-ēs, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. tetragonia(a); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -æce.]

Bot.: Alzoons; an order of Perigynous Exogæa, alliance Ficoidales. Succulent-leaved herbs, more rarely small shrubs. Leaves alternate, often with watery pustules, exstipulate. Flowers small, axillary; calyx three-to five-cleft; corolla wanting; stamens definite; styles two to nine; ovary with as many cells as there are styles; fruit an indehiscent nut, or a capsule splitting all round. Found in the South Sea Islands, the Cape, and the Mediterranean region. Tribes, Tetragoneæ and Sesuvæ. Genera, eleven; species, sixty-five. (Lindley.)

* tēt-trāg-ōn-īsm, s. [Gr. τετραγωνισμός (tetragōnismos) = to make square: τετραγώνος (tetragōnos) = four-angled, tetragonal; Fr. tetragonisme.] The attempt to square the circle.

tēt-ṛā-gō-nō-ḡ-er, [TETRAGONISM.] Having four angles or corners.

tēt-ṛā-gō-nō-lēp-lis, s. [Pref. tetragono-, and Gr. λείψ (leipsis) = a scale.]

Palæont.: A genus of Styelodontide, from the Lia. Each scale bears upon its inner anterior margin a thick, solid, bony rib, extending upwards beyond the margin of the scale, and allied off obliquely above and below, on opposite sides, for forming apices with the corresponding processes of adjoining scales.

tēt-rāg-ōn-ōl-ō-būs, s. [Pref. tetragono-, and Gr. λοβός (lobos) = a lobe.]

Bot.: A genus of Trifolieæ, akin to Lotus (q.v.), but with quadrangular winged legumes. Tetragonolobus edulis, or purpureus, is the Winged Pea. It is a native of Sicily, where its legumes were formerly eaten by the poor. It is cultivated as a border plant.

tēt-ṛā-gōn-ōp-tēr-ī-na, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. tetragonopterus(us); Lat. neut. pl. adj. suff. -ina.]

Ichthy.: A group of Characiniæ, with four genera from South Africa and tropical America. A short dorsal and adipose fin present; teeth in both jaws well developed; gill-inebrae free; nasal openings close.

tēt-ṛā-gōn-ōp-tēr-ūs, s. [Pref. tetragono-, and Gr. πτερόν (pteron) = a wing, a fin.]

Ichthy.: The type-genus of Tetragonoptera (q.v.), with about fifty species, from Central America. They are all of small size, rarely exceeding eight inches in length; dorsal in middle of the body, which is oblong or elevated, covered with scales of moderate size; belly rounded.

* tēt-trāg-ōn-ōūs, a. [Eng. tetragon; -ous.] The same as TETRAGONAL (q.v.).

tēt-ṛā-gō-nūr-ūs, s. [Pref. tetragon(o)-, and Gr. ούρα (oura) = a tail.]

Ichthy.: A genus of Atherinidæ, with a single species. Body sub-elongate, scales strongly keeled and striated; first dorsal of numerous feeble spines, and continuous with the second. It is a rare fish, more frequently met with in the Mediterranean than in the Atlantic. Nothing is known of its habits, but as, when young, it accompanies the Meduse, it must be regarded as a pelagic form. At a later period of its existence, it probably descends to greater depths, coming to the surface only at night. It attains a length of about eighteen inches.

tēt-ṛā-grām, s. [Gr. τέτρα- (tetra-), and γράμμα (gramma) = a line.]

1. A word of four letters. [TETRAGRAMMATON.]

"A host of other words, significant of Deity, are tetragramms."—Breder: Phrasæ & Public, s.v. Tetragrammaton.

2. Geom.: A figure formed by four right lines.

tēt-ṛā-grām-mā-tōn, s. [Gr. ὀρθογράμματον (to tetragrammaton) = the word of four letters; τετραγράμματος (tetragrammatos) = of four letters: τέτρα- (tetra-), and γράμμα (gramma), genit. γράμματος (grammatos) = a letter.]

1. The sacred Hebrew name of the Deity יהוה (Y H V H), from the fact that in the Rabbinical writings it is distinguished by various euphemistic expressions; as, "the name," "the name of four letters," &c.

"In his sacred confessions he [the high priest] had to pronounce ten times the sacred Tetragrammaton—the ineffable name of Jehovah."—Parrar: Early Days of Christianity, ch. xviii. § 4.

2. Hence, applied to other words of four letters expressive of Delty.

tēt-ra-grāp-tūs, s. [Pref. tētra-, and Gr. γράφω (gráphō) = written, marked with letters.]

Palæont.: A genus of Graptolitidæ from the Skiddaw and Quebec groups (Lower Silurian). The polypary consists of four simple monoprioidian branches, springing from a central non-celluliferous connecting process, which bifurcates at each end. The celluliferous branches do not subdivide, and the base may be enveloped in a peculiar horny disc.

tēt-ra-gyn, s. [TETRAGYNIA.] Bot.: Any individual of the Tetragynia.

tēt-ra-gyn-i-a, s. pl. [Pref. tētra-, and Gr. γυνή (gynē) = a woman, a female.]

Bot.: An order of plants in Linnæus's Artificial System. It consisted of plants having four pistils. The classes Tetradria, Pentandria, Hexandria, Heptandria, Octandria, and Polyandria, have each an order Tetragynia.

tēt-ra-gyn-i-an, tē-trāg-yn-ōus, a. [TETRAGYNIA.]

Bot.: Having four carpels or four styles.

tēt-ra-hē-dral, tēt-ra-ē-dral, a. [TETRAHEDRON.]

* 1. Ord. Lang.: Having four sides; composed of four sides.

2. Crystallography: (1) Having the form of the regular tetrahedron.

(2) Pertaining or relating to a tetrahedron, or the system of forms to which the tetrahedron belongs.

tetrahedral-angle, s. Geom.: A polyhedral angle having four faces.

tetrahedral-garnet, s. Min.: The same as HELVINE (q.v.).

tēt-ra-hē-drite, s. [Eng. tetrahedron]; suff. -ite (MIn.); Ger. fahlers, tetraedit.]

Min.: A name given to a group of minerals having considerable diversity in composition, but presenting the same general formula. Named from the prevailing tetrahedral habit of its crystals. Crystallization isometric, frequently twinned; hardness, 3 to 4.5; sp. gr. 4.5 to 5.11; lustre, metallic; colour and streak, steel-gray to iron-black; opaque; fracture, sub-conchoidal, uneven; brittle. Composed essentially a sulphantimonite of copper, with the formula 4CuS + Sb₂S₃; but in consequence of part of the copper being frequently replaced by iron, zinc, silver, mercury, and occasionally cobalt, and part of the antimony by arsenic and sometimes bismuth, the general formula is usually written as 4(Cu, Fe, Zn, Ag, Hg) + (Sb, As, Bi)₂S₃. Dana divides as follows: 1. An antimonial series; 2. an arsenio-antimonial series; 3. A bismuthic-arsenio-antimonial and an arsenical series, in which the antimony is entirely replaced by arsenic. [TENNANTITE.] The varieties are: (1) Ordinary, containing little or no silver; (2) argentiferous = freibergite; (3) mercuriferous = schwazite, spaniolite, and hermesite; (4) platiniferous. Feldite, apthonite, and polytellite (q.v.) are sub-species. An abundant ore in many parts of the world, sometimes, where rich in silver, mined for that metal only.

tēt-ra-hē-drōn, tēt-ra-ē-drōn, s. [Gr. τέτρα (tētra) = fourfold, and ἑδρα (hedra) = a base.]

Geom.: A polyhedron bounded by four middle points of the faces be- perly joined, two lines joining the edges of a second tetrahedron is one faces are equal and equilateral triangles. If the points of be joined two and the lines joining them form the edges of a regular tetrahedron. All regular tetrahedrons are similar solids.

tēt-ra-hēx-a-hē-dral, a. [TETRAHEXAHEDRON.] Having the form of a tetrahexahedron.

tēt-ra-hēx-a-hē-drōn, s. [Pref. tētra-, and Eng. hexahedron (q.v.).] A solid bounded by twenty-four equal faces, four corresponding to each face of the cube. Also called a Tetrakiahexahedron.

tēt-ra-lis-hēx-a-hē-drōn, s. [Gr. τετραλις (tetralis) = four times, and Eng. hexahedron.] [TETRAHEXAHEDRON.]

tē-trāl-ō-gy, s. [Gr. τετραλογία (tetralogia), from τέτρα (tētra-) = four, and λόγος (logos) = a discourse; Fr. téralogie.]

Greek Drama: The name given to a collection of four dramatic compositions—a trilogy (q.v.) and a satyric piece—exhibited together on the Athenian stage for the prize given at the festival of Bacchus. [ΣΑΤΥΡΙΚ, ¶.] The expression tetralogy is sometimes applied by modern authors to a series of four connected plays.

"This would give us twenty-seven tetralogies or one hundred and eight plays."—Donaldson: Theatre of the Greeks, p. 118.

tēt-ra-lōph-ō-dōn, s. [Pref. tētra; Gr. λόφος (lophos) = a crest, and suff. -odon.]

Palæont.: A section of the genus Mastodon marked off by Falconer, from the fact that the molars are four-ridged. The section is represented in the Miocene and Pliocene of Europe, in the Sivalik strata.

tēt-ra-lōph-ō-dōnt, a. [TETRALOPHODON.] Of or belonging to section Tetralophodon; possessing four-ridged molars.

"Tetralophodont types of the genus appear to have been represented in the Miocene period."—Nicholson: Palæontology, ii. 387.

tē-trām-ēr-a, s. pl. [Pref. tētra-, and Gr. μέρος (meros) = a part.]

Zool.: In Latreille's classification, a section of the Coleoptera (q.v.). They are distinguished by the atrophy of the fourth tarsal joint in all the feet, so that they have only four freely articulating joints. The atrophied joint is generally extremely minute, and concealed in the deep notch of the third joint, which, in the majority of the species, is bilobed and clothed beneath with a brush of minute hairs. The section includes more than a third of the whole order, and all the species are vegetable-feeders.

tē-trām-ēr-ōus, a. [TETRAMERA.]

I. Ord. Lang.: Consisting of four parts; characterized by having four parts.

II. Technically:

1. Bot.: Divided into four parts; having four parts or pieces. (Asa Gray.)

2. Entom.: Of or pertaining to the Tetramera (q.v.).

tē-trām-ē-tēr, s. [Pref. tētra-, and μέτρον (metron) = a measure, a metre.]

Anc. Pros.: A verse consisting of four measures, that is, in iambic, trochaic, and anapestic verse, of eight feet; in other kinds of verse of four feet.

"The first are couplets interchanged of sixteen and fourteen feet, the second of equal tetrameters."—Drayton: Poly-Olbion, s. 4. (Selden's Illust.)

tēt-ra-mē-thyl, s. [Pref. tētra-, and Eng. methyl.] Containing four atoms of methyl.

tetramethyl-ethylene, s. Chem.: A crystalline mass obtained by heating to 100° one volume of ethylenic bromide with two volumes of methyl sulphide. It is soluble in hot water and alcohol, insoluble in ether, and is precipitated by ether from its alcoholic solution, in white prisms.

tēt-ra-morph, s. [Pref. tētra-, and Gr. μορφή (morphē) = form, figure.]

Christ. Art.: The union of the four attributes of the evangelists in one figure, winged, standing on winged, fiery wheels, the wings being covered with eyes. It is the type of unparalleled velocity. (Fairholt.)

tē-trām-dēr, s. [TETRAORIA.] Bot.: Any individual of the Tetraoria (q.v.).

tē-trām-dri-a, s. pl. [Pref. tētra-, and Gr. ἀντήρ (antēr), genit. ἀντήρος (antēros) = a male.]

Bot.: The fourth class in Linnæus's Artificial System. It consists of plants having four stamens of equal length. Orders: Monogynia, Digynia, and Tetragynia.

tē-trān-droūs, tē-trān-dri-an, a. [TETRANDRIA.]

Botany: 1. (Of the form tetrandrous): Having four stamens; spec., having four stamens of equal length.

2. (Of the form tetrandrian): Of or belonging to the Tetrandria (q.v.).

tēt-rāne, s. [Gr. τέτρα (tētra-) in comp. = four; suff. -ane.] [BUTANE.]

tēt-rant, s. [Gr. τέτρα (tētra-) = four.] One of the four equal parts into which the area of a circle is divided by two diameters drawn at right angles to each other. (Wale.)

tē-trān-thōr-a, s. [Pref. tētra-, and Gr. ἀνθήρα (anthēra) = blooming.]

Bot.: A genus of Lauraceæ (q.v.). Trees mostly from the East, with feather-veined leaves and umbels of generally dioecious flowers, surrounded by bracts. The fruit of T. laurifolia, a moderate-sized Indian and Javanese tree, yields an oil. The seeds of T. monopetalata, also an Indian tree, furnish an oil used for ointment and for candles. The oil from the berries of T. laurifolia is used in rheumatism, the bark saturated in water or milk is applied to bruises. It is given internally in diarrhoea, dysentery, &c. The tree has a fine wood. The bark of T. monopetalata is mildly astringent and has balsamic properties. It is used medicinally like the oil from the former species.

tē-trān-ŷ-chūs, s. [Pref. tētra-, and Gr. οὐχ (ouch), genit. ούχως (ouchos) = a claw.]

Zool.: A genus of Trombididæ. Tetranychus telarius is the Red Spider (q.v.). T. glaber is found under stones in damp places, and T. lapidum under stones and on plants.

tēt-rā-ōn, s. [Lat., from Gr. τετραών (tetraōn) = the blackcock.]

1. Ornith.: The type genus of Tetraoninæ (q.v.), with seven species, from the northern parts of Palearctic and Nearctic regions; but in some localities where they were formerly abundant, they now exist in greatly reduced numbers, and in some places have become extinct. Bill strong, upper mandible curved, head slightly crested, feathers of the chin elongated and pointed, tarsi completely covered with hair-like feathers.

2. Palæont.: From the Post-pliocene of Italian caves.

tē-trā-ō-dōn, s. [TETRODON.]

tēt-rā-ō-gāl-lūs, s. [Mod. Lat. tetrao, and gallus.]

Ornith.: Snow-partridge; a genus of Perdicina, with four species, ranging from the Caucasus and Himalayas to the Altai Mountains. Bill short, broad at the base, with tip curved; head plumed; tarsi naked, shorter than middle toe, in the males armed with strong spur; halux raised, short; wings with second and third quilla longest; tail broad, rounded.

tē-trā-ō-nid, a. & s. [TETRAONIDÆ.]

A. As adj.: Of or pertaining to the Tetraonidæ (q.v.).

B. As subst.: One of the family of Tetraonidæ.

tēt-rā-ōn-i-dæ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. tetrao, genit. tetraon(is); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -idæ.]

Ornith.: A family of Galline, or Game Birds, with four sub-families, Tetraoninæ, Perdicina, Odontophorinæ, and Pteroclinæ (often elevated to the rank of a family). The Tetraonidæ include the Grouse, Partridge, Quails, and allied forms. Wallace (Geog. Dist. Anim., ii. 333) considers that they are essentially denizens of the great northern continents, and that their entrance into South America, Australia, and South Africa is, comparatively speaking, recent. They have developed into forms equally suited to the tropical plains and the arctic regions, some of them being among the few denizens of the extreme north as well as of the highest alpine snows. He puts the genera at twenty-nine and the species at 120. [TETRAO.]

fāte, fāt, fāre, amidst, whāt, fāll, father; wē, wēt, hēre, camel, hēr, thēre; pine, pīt, sire, sir, marine; gō, pōt, or, wōre, wōlf, wōrk, whō, sōn; mūte, cūb, cūre, quite, cūr, rāle, fūll; trŷ, Sŷrian. æ, œ = ē; ey = ā; qu = kw.

tēt-rā-ō-nī-nāe, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. tetrao, genit. tetraon(i); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -īnā.]

Ornith.: The typical sub-family of the Tetraonidae (q.v.), chiefly from the northern parts of the Palaearctic and Nearctic regions, with the following genera: Tetrao, Bonasa, Centrocercus, Dendragapus, Canace, Falci-pennis, Pedicocera, Cupidonia, and Lagopus. They are rather large in size, heavy in body, with small heads, the nasal fossae filled with feathers concealing the nostrils; neck moderately long; wings short, rounded, and concave beneath; stout legs and feet; toes with pectinations of scales along the edges, hind toe elevated above the plane of the rest; tarsi covered with feathers, in Bonasa partially, in Lagopus to the claws.

tēt-trā-ō-nīx, s. [TETRANYCHUS.]

Zool.: An Asiatic genus of Emyde; having five toes, but one on each foot without a nail. Twenty-five marginal scales. Species, Tetraonyx lessonii and T. basica.

tēt-rā-ō-phā-sīs, s. [Mod. Lat. tetrao, and Lat. phasis.] [PHEASANT.]

Ornith.: Lophophorus obscurus; often made a separate genus of the sub-family Lophophorinae (q.v.), connecting the Phasianidae with Tetraogallina, and so with the Perdiciinae. This bird was discovered by Père David in Tibet, and described by him. General colour brown, marked with darker shades; bare skin of face red, tarsi and feet horn-colour. The sexes are alike in plumage; female destitute of spurs.

tēt-rā-pēt-āl-ōūs, a. [Pref. tetra-, and Eng. petalou (q.v.).]

Bot.: Having four petals. "All the tetrapetalous siliqueous plants are sikaless."—Arbutinao.

tēt-rā-phar-mā-cōn, tēt-rā-phar-mā-cūm, s. [Pref. tetra-, and Gr. φάρμακον (pharmakon) = a drug.] A combination of wax, resin, lard, and pitch, composing an ointment.

tēt-rā-phē-nōl, s. [Pref. tetra-, and Eng. phenol.]

Chem.: C₆H₆O. A neutral, colourless liquid, obtained by distilling the pyromucates with soda-lime. It boils at 32°.

tēt-rā-phyl-līne, s. [Pref. tetra-; Gr. φύλη (phulē) = a stem, suff. -īne (Min.).]

Min.: The same as TRIPHYLITE (q.v.).

tēt-trāph-yl-loūs, a. [Pref. tetra-, and Gr. φύλλον (phullon) = a leaf.]

Bot.: Having four leaves.

tēt-rā-plā, s. [Gr. τετραπλόος (tetraploos) = fourfold; Fr. tétraple.]

Sacred Literature: An edition of the whole or a part of the Scriptures in four parallel columns; specif., an edition of the Greek Testament compiled by Origen, containing the versions of Aquila, Symmachus, the Septuagint, and Theodotus. [HEXAPLA.]

tēt-rā-pleū-ra, s. [Pref. tetra-, and Gr. πλευρόν (pleuron) = a rib.]

Bot.: A genus of Eumimoseae.

tēt-rāp-neū-mō-nēs, s. pl. [Pref. tetra-, and Gr. πνεύμονες (pneumones) = the lungs.]

Zool.: Four-lunged Spiders, a tribe of Araneida, with a single family, Mygalidae (q.v.). There are two pairs of lung-sacs and two pairs of spinnerets, and the claws of the faces bend downward.

tēt-rāp-neū-mō-nī-an, s. [TETRAPNEUMONES.] Any individual of the tribe Tetrapneumonea (q.v.).

tēt-rā-pōd, s. [Gr. τέτρα- (tetra-) = four, and ποῦς (pous), genit. ποδός (podos) = a foot.] A four-footed animal, especially an insect having only four perfect legs, as certain Lepidoptera.

† tēt-rā-pōd-īch-nīte, s. [Eng. tetrapod, and technē (q.v.).]

Palaeont.: The footprint of a four-footed animal left on the rocks.

* tēt-trāp-ō-dy, s. [TETRAPOD.] A series of four feet; a measure or distance of four feet.

Tēt-rā-pōl-ī-tan, a. [Gr. τετραπόλις (tetrapolis) = of or with four cities.] Of or belonging to four towns. (See compound.)

Tetrapolitan Confession, s.

Symbolic Books: The Confession of Faith presented to the Diet of Augsburg in 1530 by the representatives of the cities of Constance, Lindau, Memmingen, and Strasburg. It was the same as the Confession of Augsburg, except in a minuta verbal difference in the part relating to the Eucharist.

tēt-rā-pō-mā, s. [Pref. tetra-, and Gr. πῶμα (pōma) = a lid, a cover; so named because the capsule is four-valved.]

Bot.: The typical genus of Tetrapomidae (q.v.). Pouch one-celled, four-valved; with four rows of seeds. Plants from Siberia and North-western America.

tēt-rā-pō-mī-dā, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. tetrapomada; Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -īdā.]

Bot.: A family of Pleurohizaeae (q.v.).

tēt-rā-pri-ō-nīd-ī-an, a. [Pref. tetra-, and dimin. from Gr. πρίων (prion) = a saw.]

Zool.: A term applied to all the forms grouped under Phyllograptus (q.v.), in which the polypary is leaf-like in shape, and consists of four rows of cellulae placed back to back.

tēt-rā-prō-tō-dōn, s. [Pref. tetra-; Gr. πρῶτος (prōtos) = first, and ὀδούς (odontos), genit. ὀδόντος (odontos) = a tooth.]

Palaeont.: A genus of Hippopotamidae, or a sub-genus of Hippopotamus. The group is distinguished from Hexaprotodon (q.v.), by having only four lower incisors. It therefore includes the fossil species from the Pliocene and Post-Pliocene of Europe, and the living Hippopotamus amphibius.

tēt-trāp-tēr-an, s. [Pref. tetra = four, and Gr. πτερόν (pteron) = a wing.] An insect which has four wings, the normal number, as distinguished from a dipteran and an apteran.

tēt-trāp-tēr-ōūs, a. [TETRAPTERAN.] Having four wings or processes resembling wings. (Used chiefly in botany.)

tēt-trāp-tēr-ūs, s. [Pref. tetra-, and Gr. πτερόν (pteron) = a fin.]

Palaeont.: A genus of Xiphidae (q.v.), from the Chalk of Lewes and Maestricht and the London Clay of Sheppey.

tēt-rāp-tōte, s. [Gr. τετραπῶτος (tetrapōtos) = with four grammatical cases; τέτρα- (tetra-) = four, and πῶσις (pōsis) = a case.]

Gram.: A noun which has four cases only.

tēt-rā-py-rēn-ōūs, a. [Pref. tetra-, and Gr. πυρην (pyren) = the stone of a stone-fruit.]

Bot.: Having four stones.

tetraquetrous (as tēt-trātrī-wō-trūs), a. [Pref. tetra-, and Lat. quadratus = square.]

Bot.: Having four angles or sides.

tēt-trārch, * tēt-rārch, * tēt-rārch, * tēt-rārch, s. & a. [Lat. tetrarchia, from Gr. τετραρχία (tetrarchiā) = a tetrarch, from τέτρο (tetra-), for τέτρα- (tetra-) = four, and ἀρχω (archō) = to rule; Fr. tetrarque.]

A. As subst.: A Roman governor of the fourth part of a province; a subordinate prince or governor; a petty prince or sovereign. "While kings and tetrarchs proud, a purple train... Possess'd the rising grounds and drier plain."—Rowe: Lucan; Pharsalia vii.

B. As adj.: Four principal or chief; as, tetrarch elements. (Fuller.)

* tēt-trārch-ate, tēt-rārch-ate, s. [Eng. tetrarch; -ate.] The district under a Roman tetrarch; the jurisdiction of a tetrarch; a tetrarchy.

* tēt-rārch-chīc-āl, o. [Gr. τετραρχικός (tetrarchikōs), from τετραρχία (tetrarchiā) = a tetrarch.] Of or pertaining to a tetrarch or tetrarchy.

* tēt-rārch-chīc-āl, o. [Gr. τετραρχικός (tetrarchikōs), from τετραρχία (tetrarchiā) = a tetrarch.] Of or pertaining to a tetrarch or tetrarchy.

tēt-rārch-chy, * tēt-rārch-chīe, s. [Fr. tetrarchie, from Lat. tetrarchia; Gr. τετραρχία (tetrarchiā).] A tetrarchate (q.v.).

tēt-rō-dōn, tē-trā-ō-dōn, s. [Pref. tetra-, and dōn (dōnus), genit. dōnōs (odontos) = a tooth.]

Ichthy.: The type genus of Tetrodontias, having the upper and lower jaws divided by a mesial suture, so as to separate the dentition into four distinct portions. More than sixty species are known, from tropical and sub-tropical seas. In some the dermal spines are extremely small, and may be absent altogether, and many of them are highly ornamented with spots or bands. A few live in large rivers: as, Tetrodon pinnatus, from Brazil, T. fahaka, from the Nile and West African rivers, and T. flaviventris, from brackish waters and rivers of the East Indies. T. lagocephalus has been taken on the coast of Cornwall and Ireland, the largest recorded being twenty-one inches long.

TETRODON MARGERITATUS.

tēt-rō-dōn-tī-na, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. tetrodon, genit. tetrodoni(s); Lat. neut. pl. adj. suff. -ina.]

Ichthy.: A widely-distributed group of Gymnodontae. They are marine fishes, of moderate or small size, from tropical or sub-tropical seas, with a few fresh-water species, arranged in eight genera, of which the most important are Tetrodon (including Xenopetrus) and Diodon. The body is short, thick, and cylindrical, with well-developed fins, and covered with a thick, scaleless skin, in which spines of various sizes are embedded. They can inflate the body by filling the distensible oesophagus with air, and then they assume a more or less globular form, floating belly upwards, whence they are called Globe-fishes; and from their defensive spinous armour they are often known as Sea-hedgehogs. When captured they produce a sound, probably by the expulsion of air from the oesophagus. Some of them are highly poisonous; but as the poisonous qualities of their flesh vary greatly in intensity in different species and in different localities, it is probable that they acquire the deleterious properties from their food, which consists of corals and hard-shelled molluscs, for crushing which the broad posterior surface of their jaws is well-adapted.

2. Palæont.: From the Eocene of Monte Bolca and Licata.

tēt-trōl-ic, a. [Gr. tétra (tetra) = four; suff. -ol, -ic.]

Chem.: Having four atoms of carbon in the series.

tetrolic-acid, s.

Chem.: C4H4O2. A monobasic acid prepared by heating chlor a erotonic acid with alcoholic potassic hydrate on the water-bath, decomposing the potassium salt formed with sulphuric acid, and extracting with ether. It crystallizes in rhombic plates, soluble in alcohol and ether, melts at 76°5', and boils at 203°.

tēt-rŷl, s. [Gr. tétra (tetra) = four; suff. -yl.] [BUTYL.]

tē-trŷl-a-mine, s. [Eng. tetryl, and amine.] [BUTYLAMINE.]

tēt-rŷl-ēno, s. [Eng. tetryl; -ene.] [BUTENE.]

tetrylene-diamine, s.

Chem.: C4H12N2=N2 { C4H3 } H4. A base produced by the action of nascent hydrogen upon ethylene cyanide. It boils at 140°.

tēt-rŷl-ēn-ic, a. [Eng. tetrylene(s); -ic.]

Chem.: Containing tetrylene.

tetrylenic-acetate, s.

Chem.: C8H14O4 = { C4H5 } O2. A colourless, oily liquid, prepared by distilling tetrylene bromide with argentic acetate. Insoluble in water, soluble in alcohol and ether, boils at 200°, and readily decomposed by alkalis.

tetrylenic-alcohol, s. [BUTENE-OLYCOL.]

tetrylenic-bromide, s.

Chem.: C4H4Br2. An oily liquid obtained by mixing tetrène with bromine vapour. It boils at 156°.

tetrylenic-chloride, s.

Chem.: C4H4Cl2. A colourless oil obtained by the direct union of chlorine with tetrène in diffused daylight. It has a sweetish odour, a burning taste, sp. gr. 1.112 at 28°, boils at 123°, is insoluble in water, but soluble in alcohol and ether.

tēt-rŷl-in, s. [Eng. tetryl; -in.]

Chem.: The hypothetical radical derived from Tetrylene (q.v.).

tetrylin-triamine, s.

Chem.: C4H12N3 = N3 { C4H7 } H2. A triatomic base produced by the action of nascent hydrogen on cyanogen. It boils at 170°.

tēt-tēr (1), * tet-er, * tet-ere, * tet-tar, s.

[A. S. teter, prob. cogn. with Icel. títtra = to shiver, to twinkle; Ger. zittern = to tremble; zittermal = a tetter, ringworm; O. H. Ger. citaroeh, zitaroeh; Fr. dartre; Sansc. dardru = a tetter.]

*têx-tu-ist, s. [Eng. text; -ist.] A textualist or text-man.

"The little our Saviour could prevail about this doctrine of charity against the crabbed textualists of his time."—Milton : Doctrine of Divorce. (To the Parliament.)

têx-tu-lâr-í-a, *têx-ti-lâr-í-a, s. [Mod. Lat., dimin. from textus = woven, pa. par. of texo = to weave.]

1. Zool. : A genus of Globigerinida. Test generally conical or wedge-shaped, consisting of numerous chambers arranged in two alternate, parallel series; aperture lateral, not beaked, situated beneath the apex.

2. Paleont. : From the Carboniferous onward.

têx-ture, s. [Fr., from Lat. textura = a web, from textus, pa. par. of texo = to weave.]

I. Ordinary Language :

1. The act, art, or process of weaving.

"Skins, although a natural habit unto all before the invention of texture, were something more unto Adam."—Browne.

2. That which is woven; a web; a fabric formed by weaving. (Lit. & fig.)

"Others, apart far in the grassy dale, Or roughening waste, their humble texture weave."—Thomson : Spring, 643.

3. The manner of weaving, with respect either to form or matter; the disposition, arrangement, or connection of threads, filaments, or other slender bodies interwoven.

dêl, bôy; pout, jôwi; cat, çell, chorus, çhin, bench; go, gem; thin, this; sin, as; expect, Xenophon, exist. -íng. -clan, -tian = çhan. -tion, -sion = çhün; -fion, -sion = zhün. -clous, -tious, -sious = ahüs. -ble, -die, &c. = bpl, dpl.

4. The disposition of the several elementary constituent parts of any body in connection with each other; the manner in which the constituent parts of any body are disposed, arranged, or united.

"While the particles continue entire, they may compose bodies of the same nature and texture as, with water and earth composed of entire particles in the beginning."—Newton.

II. Technically:

1. Anat.: The particular arrangement of the elements of tissue constituting any organ. It is used chiefly in describing the solid portions of the body, but is sometimes extended to the corpuscles of the blood, &c.

2. Petrol.: The state with regard to consolidation of the several rocks (see extract), and the arrangement of their particles, as the "slaty texture." It refers to the arrangement of the parts of a rock on a smaller scale than the word structure.

"The more compact, stony, and crystalline texture of the older as compared to the newer rocks."—Lyell; Princ. of Geol., ch. xii.

tēx-tūre, v.t. [TEXTURE, s.] To form a texture of or with; to interweave.

tēx-tū-rĭ, s. [TEXTURE, s.] The art or process of weaving.

tēx-tūs, s. [Lat. = (1) texture; (2) construction, connection, context.] The text of any book, spec. of the Bible.

textus-receptus, s.

Biblical Criticism: A received text; one from which, as being the best accessible, translators make their version into the vernacular. The textus receptus of the Old Testament is the Hebrew text, from which the Authorized English Version of that portion of the Bible was made. The textus receptus of the New Testament is the Greek text, from which the Authorized English Version was produced. The term textus might also, without impropriety, be used of the Hebrew and Greek texts chosen by the revisers as the basis of the Revised Version. The textus receptus of the Old Testament in the A.V. rested on the Hebrew Masoretic Text, which has come down in manuscripts of no great antiquity, and all of the same family or recension. The oldest Hebrew manuscript of which the age is known, bears date A.D. 916. There are no materials to submit the Hebrew text to proper critical revision, and the revisers adhere to it nearly to the same extent as the translators of the Authorized Version. The case is different with the New Testament. The textus receptus on which the A.V. was constructed was chiefly that of Beza, published in 1589. It had been based on Stephen's edition of 1550, and this again on the fourth edition of Erasmus, A.D. 1517. None of the manuscripts used were of first rate authority. The revisers had the advantage of Codex A (the Alexandrian manuscript) of the fifth century; Codex B (the Vatican manuscript) of the fourth century, or earlier; Codex C (the Ephraim manuscript) of the fifth century; Codex D (the manuscript of Beza) of the sixth century; and Codex κ (the Sinaitic manuscript) of the fourth century. Numerous improved readings have therefore been introduced. The text which they chose was published separately by the Clarendon Press at Oxford in 1881.

teyne, s. [Lat. tenia = a band, a fillet.] A thin plate of metal.

thäck, thak, thakke, s. [A.S. thac = thatch; cogn. with Dut. dak; Icel. thak; Dan. tag; Sw. tak; Ger. dach.] The older and provincial form of thatch (q.v.).

thack and rape, s. or adv. Thatch and rope; used figuratively for snug and comfortable.

"We'll a' be as right and tight as thack and rape can make us."—Scott; Guy Mannering, ch. I.

thäck, thäcke (1), thak, thakke, v.t. [THACK, s.] To thatch.

thäcke (2), thakke, v.t. [A.S. thaccian = to stroke; Icel. thjökka = to thwack, to thump.] [THWACK.] To thump, to thwack.

"Thack'd hire about the lendes wel."—Chaucer; C. T., 3.302.

thäck-ēr, s. [Eng. thack (1), v.; -er.] A thatcher. (Prov.) thäe, pron. [See def.] These. (Scotch.)

"One of these dumb dogs that cauna bark."—Scott; Waverley, ch. xxvi.

thäirm, s. [THARM.] A small gut; catgut, fiddlestring. (Scotch.)

"When I am tired of scraping thairm or singing ballads."—Scott; Redgauntlet, letter xi.

thäl-äm-ën-gēph'-a-lōn, s. [Gr. θάλαμος (thalamos) = a bed-chamber, and ἐγκεφάλου (engkephalou) = the brain.]

Embryol.: A cerebral rudiment corresponding to the thalami optici and the third ventricle of the brain. (Huxley.) thäl-a-mē-phōr-ūs, thäl-a-mē-phōr-ōs (pl. thäl-a-mē-phōr-i, thäl-a-mē-phōr-ōi), s. [Mod. Gr. θαλαμήφορος (thalamēphoros): θαλάμη (thalamē) = an ark, a shrine, and φόρος (phoros) = bearing.]

Egyptian Antiq.: A kneeling figure supporting a shrine or inscribed tablet. These statues probably represent priests and initiated women who carried about in procession the statues of the gods. It was usual for such processions to stand still from time to time, when the priests, kneeling probably, presented to the people the images of the deities, either to be worshipped or kissed. (Herod., ii. 48, 49; see also Montfaucon; Diar. Ital., p. 361.)

THALAMEPHORUS.

"Statues of this class are now commonly called Pastophori or Thalamēphori."—Library Entertaining Knowledge; Egyptian Antiquities, l. 379.

thäl-a-mī-flōr-ēs, s.pl. [Lat. thalamus = a bed-chamber, and flor, genit. floris = a flower.]

Bot.: A sub-class of Dicotyledonous plants established by De Candolle. Petals many, distinct, inserted in the receptacle; atamena similarly inserted; hence, hypogynous. Twenty-three orders have representative in Britain, including Ranunculaceæ, Cruciferae, Malvaceæ, Hypericaceæ, &c.

thäl-a-mī-flōr-al, a. [Mod. Lat. thalamiflorus]; Eng. adj. suff. -al.]

Bot.: Having the petals and stamens inserted in the receptacle; of or belonging to the Thalamifloræ (q.v.).

thäl-lā-mī-ūm, s. [Gr. θαλαμῖος (thalamios) = belonging to a bed-chamber.]

Botany:

1. A hollow case containing spores in algae.
2. The disc or lamina prolifera of lichens.
3. A form of the hymenium in fungals.

thäl'-a-mūs, s. [Lat., from Gr. θάλαμος (thalamos) = a bed-chamber.]

1. Anat.: The place at which it has been thought a nerve originates; spec., the optic thalami (q.v.). Called also the Posterior cerebral ganglia.

2. Botany:

- (1) Tournefort's name for the Clinanthium (q.v.).
- (2) The receptacle or torus at the top of the peduncle of a flower.
- (3) The thallus of a fungal.

thäl-äss-, pref. [THALASSO-]

†thäl-äss-arc-tōs, thäl-arc-tōs, s. [Pref. thalass-, and Gr. ἄρκτος (arktos) = a bear.]

Zool.: Gray's name for Ursus maritimus, the Polar Bear, to which he gave generic distinction.

thäl-äss-sō-mā, s. [Formed by Cuvier from Gr. θάλασσα (thalassa) = the sea.]

Zool.: A genus of Gephyrea (q.v.). Body cylindrical, rounded, and smooth behind; no tentacles; vent at end of body; proboscis short. It is said that the species penetrate limestone.

thä-läs-sī-cōl-lā, s. [Gr. θάλασσα (thalassa) = the sea, and κόλλα (kolla) = jelly.]

Zool.: The type-genus of Thalassicolida (q.v.). It contains a number of compound, siliceous spicules embedded in the ectosarc.

thä-läs-sī-cōl-lī-ā, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. thalassicolli]; Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -idā.]

Zool.: A family of Radiolaria. The animals consist of structureless cysts, containing cellular elements and protoplasm, surrounded by a layer of protoplasm, giving off pseudopodia, which commonly stand out like rays, but sometimes run into another, and so form networks. The best-known genera are Thalassicola, Sphaerocodium, and Collospira. They are all marine, being found floating passively on the surface of most seas, and vary in size from an inch in diameter downwards.

thä-läs-sī-cōl-lī-nā, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. thalassicolli]; Lat. neut. pl. adj. suff. -ina.]

Zool.: An approximate synonym of Thalassicolida (q.v.).

thäl-äss-sī-rō-mā, s. [Gr. θάλασσα (thalassa) = the sea, and δρομεύς (dromēus) = a runner.]

Ornith.: An old genus of Procellariidæ (q.v.). [TUBINARES.]

thäl-äss-sī-nā, s. [Lat. thalassinus = sea-coloured.]

Zool.: The type-genus of Thalassinidæ (q.v.), with one species, Thalassinia scorpioides, from the coast of Chili.

thäl-äss-sīn'-ī-an, s. [THALASSINA.] Any individual of the family Thalassiniidæ (q.v.).

thäl-äss-sīn'-ī-dæ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. thalassinidæ]; Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -idæ.]

Zool.: A widely-distributed family of Macrurus Decapoda. Abdomen long, not very solid, carapace small and compressed; first pair of legs large; aeternal plate long and narrow.

thä-läs-sī-ō, pref. [THALASSO-] thä-läs-sī-ō-phŷl-lūm, s. [Pref. thalass-, and Gr. φύλλον (phullon) = a leaf.]

Bot.: A genus of Algae, akin to Laminaria, but having the frond spirally wound around the stem. Found on the north-western shores of Arctic America.

thä-läs-sī-ō-phŷ-tā, s. pl. [Pref. thalass-, and Gr. φυτόν (phuton) = a plant.]

Bot.: Lamouroux's name for Algae, because most of them are marine.

thä-läs-sī-ō-phŷte, s. [THALASSOPHYTA.]

Bot.: Any individual of the old order Thalassiphyta (q.v.); an algal.

thä-läs-sō, thäl-äss, thä-läs-sī-ō, pref. [Gr. θαλάσσιος (thalassios) = marine.]

Of or belonging to the sea; inhabiting the sea; marine.

thä-läs-sō-chēl'-ŷs, s. [Pref. thalasso-, and Gr. χελύς (chelus) = a tortoise.]

Zool.: Loggerhead Turtle; a genus of Cheloniidæ, equivalent to the genus Couana of older authors, with two or three species from tropical seas. Plates of the carapace not imbricated; fifteen plates on the disc; jaws slightly curved towards each other at their extremity.

thäl-äss-sōm'-ē-tēr, s. [Pref. thalasso-, and Eng. meter.] A tide-gauge.

thä-läs-sō-phŷr-ē-nē, s. [Pref. thalasso-, and Gr. φύνη (phrunē) = a toad.]

Ichthy.: A genus of Batrachide, with two species, from the Atlantic and Pacific coasts of Central America. The spinous dorsal is formed by two spines only, each of which is hollow, like the opercular spine, and conveys the contents of a poison-bag situated at the base. The poison-bags have no external muscular layer, and are situated immediately below the thick, loose skin which envelops the spines; the ejection of the poison therefore can only be effected by the pressure to which the poison-bag is subjected the moment the spine enters another body.

THALASSOPHYRNE RETICULATA.

A. Perforated opercular spine.

fäte, fät, färe, amidst, whät, fäll, father; wē, wēt, hère, camel, hër, thère; pine, pīt, sīre, sīr, marine; gō, pōt, or, wōre, wōlf, wōrk, whō, sōn; mūte, cūb, oūre, qnīte, cūr, rūle, fūll; trŷ, Sŷrian. æ, œ = ē; ey = ā; qu = kw.

thál-at-tól-ò-gý, s. [Gr. θάλαττα (thalatta) the sea; suff. -ology.] The science which treats of the sea.

"A sufficient theory of thalatology."—Proc. Phys. Soc. London, pt. II.

thále, s. [Named after Thal (1642-1588), who included the Thale Cross in his Sylvæ Hercynica. (Prior.)] (See compound.)

thale-cross, s.

Bot.: A book name for Arabis Thaliana.

thá-lér (th as t), s. [Ger.] [DOLLAR.] A German silver coin, worth about seventy-five cents. Prior to 1871, it was the monetary unit, but in that year was superseded by the mark, value about twenty-five cents.

thál-ér-òph-g-ga, s. pl. [Gr. θαλερός (thaleros) = blooming, fresh, and φαγειν (phagein) = to eat.]

Entom.: Macleay's name for the Cetonidae.

thál-ér-òph-g-góuá, a. [THALEROPHAGA.] Feeding on flowers.

"By the disposition also of the thalerophagus groups."—Saxton & Buckard: Treatise on Insects, p. 21.

thál-heim-íte (or th as t), s. [After Thalmheim, Erzgebirge, where found; suff. -ite (Min.).]

Min.: The same as DANAITÉ (q. v.).

Thá-lí-a, s. [Gr.]

1. Gr. Antiq.:

One of the Muses, generally regarded as the patroness of comedy. She was supposed by some, also, to preside over husbandry and planting, and is represented leaning on a column, holding a mask in her right hand, by which she is distinguished from her sisters, as also by a shepherd's crook.

THALIA.

2. Bot.: A genus of Marantaceae. Thalia dealbata, an elegant aquatic plant, with panicles of purple flowers, is found in South Carolina.

3. Min.: The earth supposed to be an oxide of a new element thallium (q. v.).

4. Astron.: [ASTEROID, 23.]

thá-lí-an, thá-lí-an, a. [THALIA.] Pertaining or relating to Thalia, the muse of pastoral and comic poetry; comic.

thá-lío-trüm, s. [Lat.]

Bot.: Meadow-rue; a genus of Ranunculaceae, tribe Anemoneae. Involucre none; sepals four or five, imbricated in aestivation; corolla wanting; stamens many; styles several; achenes sessile, or nearly so, usually acute at both ends, awless. Known species fifty, from the temperate and colder parts of the northern hemispheres. In the United States occur several species. T. anemonoides, the Rue Anemone, is common in woods in the north. In appearance it is more like Anemone than Thalictrum, and is of attractive aspect. Two others are T. Cornuti, the Meadow Rue, and T. dioicum, the Early Meadow Rue. Of European species may be named T. alpinum, the Alpine T. minus, the Lesser, and T. flavum, the Common Meadow Rue. The root of T. foliosum, from the temperate parts of the Himalayas, is given in India as a tonic and aperient in convalescence after fever, in chronic dyspepsia, &c.

thá-líte, s. [Eng. thallium; suff. -ite (Min.).]

Min.: A variety of saponite (q. v.), occurring in amygdaloidal rocks on the north shore of Lake Superior.

thá-lí-üm, s. [Etym. doubtful.]

Min.: A name given to a supposed new element, which apparently has no existence.

thál-leí-ò-chín, s. [Formed from Gr. θαλλός (thallos) = a green bud, and Peruv. quina = bark.]

Chem.: Dalleiochin. A green substance produced by the action of chlorine and then ammonia on a solution of quinine. In dilute solutions it remains dissolved as a bright emerald green colour, and forms a highly delicate test for the presence of small quantities of quinine.

thál-léne, s. [Gr. θαλλός; -ene.]

Chem.: A solid hydrocarbon isomerio with anthracene obtained from the last products which pass over in the distillation of American petroleum. It is distinguished by a green fluorescence, and, when illuminated by violet and ultra-violet light, exhibits a fluorescent spectrum containing light-green bands. (Watts: Sup.) thál-lío, a. [Eng. thallium]; -ia.] Pertaining to or containing thallium.

thallio-chloride, s. [THALLIUM-CHLORIDE.]

thallio-oxide, s. [THALLIUM-OXIDE.]

thál-lí-òus, a. [Eng. thallium]; -ous.] Pertaining to thallium.

thallous-chloride, s. [THALLIUM-CHLORIDE.]

thallous-oxide, s. [THALLIUM-OXIDE.]

thál-lite, s. [Gr. θαλλός (thallos) = a twig; suff. -ite (Min.).]

Min.: The same as OIRANITE (q. v.).

thál-lí-üm, s. [Latinised from Gr. θαλλός (thallos) = a green bud, from the green line it gives in the spectrum, which led to its discovery.]

Chem.: Symbol Tl. At. wt. 203.64. A triad metallic element discovered by Crookes in 1861, and widely distributed as a constituent in iron and copper pyrites, in blende, native sulphur, and in many kinds of ores. It can be distilled along with the sulphur by heating pyrites to a bright-red heat, then dissolving out the excess of sulphur by boiling with caustic soda, collecting and washing the sulphide of thallium, converting it into sulphate, and precipitating the thallium in the metallic state by the action of pure metallic zinc. The spongy metal is compressed, dried, and fused into a bright metallic button by heating under cyanide of potassium. It is a perfect metal, with high lustre, not quite so white as silver, but free from the blue tinge of lead. It has a sp. gr. of 11.80-11.91, melts at 293°, is a very soft metal, with less tenacity than lead, and almost devoid of elasticity. It communicates an intense green hue to a colourless flame, and its spectrum consists of one intensely brilliant and sharp green line, coinciding with the number 1442.6 on Kirchhoff's chart.

thallium-alcohol, s. [THALLIUM-ETHER.]

thallium-chloride, s.

Chem.: Thallium forms four chlorides:

(1) Dichloride of thallium: Tl_2Cl_4 . A pale yellow compound formed by carefully heating the protochloride in a slow current of chlorine.

(2) Sesquichloride of thallium, Tl_2Cl_3 . Produced by dissolving thallium in nitromuriatic acid. It separates in yellow crystalline scales, and dissolves in 380 times its weight of water at 15°.

(3) Thallic chloride, $TlCl_3$. Formed by dissolving the trioxide in hydrochloric acid. The hydrated chloride can be obtained in long colourless prisms, which melt easily, and decompose at a high temperature.

(4) Thallous chloride, $TlCl$. Formed by adding hydrochloric acid to a thallous salt. A white curdy precipitate resembling chloride of silver is produced, which dissolves like chloride of lead in boiling water. It is insoluble in alcohol.

thallium-ether, s.

Chem. (Pl.): Compounds formed by the action of thallium on alcohols, e.g., Thallium-ethylate = C_2H_5TlO . Produced when thallium and ethylic alcohol are heated in a sealed tube to 100°. Being freed from excess of alcohol, it remains as an oil of sp. gr. 3.48 to 3.55, being the heaviest liquid known except mercury. It dissolves in five parts absolute alcohol, in pure ether, and chloroform.

thallium-glass, s. A glass of great density and refracting power, in the preparation of which thallium is used instead of lead or potassium.

thallium-oxide, s.

Chem.: Thallium forms two oxides:

(1) Thallous oxide (protoxide), Tl_2O . Prepared by allowing the granulated metal to oxidize in moist air, boiling in distilled water, and repeating the process two or three times. The hydrated oxide crystallizes out in yellow needles. The anhydrous oxide forms a reddish black mass, and is obtained by exposing the hydrated oxide to a vacuum over sulphuric acid. In water it forms a strongly alkaline solution, which dissolves the skin and stains the nails a deep-brown. Like potash, it decomposes the salts of the alkaline earths and metals.

(2) Thallic oxide (peroxide), Tl_2O_2 . The chief product of burning the metal in oxygen. The anhydrous oxide is a dark-brown powder, neutral to test paper, insoluble in water and alkalis, but dissolves readily in acids, forming unstable salts.

thallium-salts, s. pl.

Chem.: Both oxides form, with acids, definite and crystallizable salts, none of which is of much importance.

thallium-triamine, s.

Chem.: N_3TlH_6 . Known in combination as a hydrochlorate, $N_3TlH_6 \cdot 3HCl$, a compound formed by dissolving thallic oxide in sal-ammoniac. By the action of water it is again resolved into thallic oxide and sal-ammoniac.

thál-ló-chlóre, s. [Gr. θαλλός (thallos) = a green bud, and χλωρός (chlōros) = green.]

Chem.: A name applied by Knop and Schnerdmann to the green colouring matter of lichens, which they regard as different from ordinary chlorophyll. (Watts.)

thál-ló-gén, s. [Gr. θαλλός (thallos) = a young shoot, and γεννάω (gennaō) = to produce.]

Bot. (Pl.): A class of plants, the lowest of all in organization. They have no wood properly so called, but the stem and leaves are undistinguishable. There are no stomates or breathing pores and no tracheae. They are mere masses of cells. Their reproduction is by a special disintegration and solidification of some part of their tissue spontaneously effected. Alliances: Algæ, Fungales, and Lichens. (Lindley.)

thál-lóg-én-òus, a. [Eng. thallogen]; -ous.]

Bot.: Of or belonging to the Thallogens.

thál-lóid, a. [Eng. thallus]; -oid.]

Bot.: Resembling a thallus.

† thalloid-hepaticeæ, s. pl.

Bot.: Hepaticæ having a thallus, as distinguished from those which have leaves. They possess a well marked epidermis, having a few scattered stomates, and putting out rhizoids from its under side.

thál-ló-phýte, s. [Gr. θαλλός (thallos) = a young shoot, and φύτον (phuton) = a plant.]

Bot.: The same as THALLOOEN (q. v.).

thál-lüs (pl. thál-lí), s. [Lat., from Gr. θαλλός (thallos) = a green bough.]

Botany:

1. The fusion of root, stem, and specially leaves, into one general mass.

2. The frond of Jungermanniaceæ and Hepaticæ.

3. The lobed frond of Lichens.

4. Any algal.

5. The bed of fibres from which many fungals spring. Called also Thalamus.

Thál-müd (Th as T), s. [TALMUD.]

thál-u-rá-ní-a, s. [Lat. Thalia], and Urania.]

Ornith.: Wood-nymphs; a genus of Troböl, böy; pölüt, jöwöl; cat, çell, chorus, çin, henç; go, gem; thin, this; sin, aş; expect, Xenophon, exist. ph = f -clan, -tian = şan. -tion, -sion = şün; -tion, -şion = zhün. -cious, -tious, -sious = şüs. -ble, -dle, &c. = bel, del chillids, with eleven species extending from Brazil to Ecuador, ranging northwards as far as Costa Rica. Wings and tail of moderate size, the latter forked; bill moderate and slightly curved; tarsi clothed with feathers.

Thám-múz, Tám-múz, s. [Heb. תָּמֻז (thammuz); Gr. ὁ Θαμνώτης (ho Thammnos) both = the Tammuz; Vulg. Adonis.]

1. The tenth month of the Jewish civil year, containing twenty-nine days, and answering to a part of June and a part of July. The name was probably borrowed from the Syrian.

2. A word occurring once in the Old Testament, in a passage of extreme obscurity (Ezek. viii. 14), concerning which many conjectures have been made. The chief are: (1) That of Jerome, who records a tradition identifying Thammuz with Adonis. This opinion was adopted by Cornelius à Lapide, Osiander, Selden, Calmet, Gesenius, Ewald, &c.; (2) That of Luther, who regarded Thammuz as a name of Bacchus; and (3) That of Calvin, who believed Thammuz to be the Egyptian Osiris. The opinion of Jerome is generally accepted.

thám-nás-træ-a, s. [Gr. θάμνος (thamnos) = a bush, and Lat. astræa (q.v.).]

Palæont.: A genus of Actinozoa; twenty-seven species are in the British Jurassic, and three in the Upper Greensand. (Etheridge.)

thám-ní-úm, s. [Gr. θάμνος (thamnos) = a bush, a shrub.]

Bot.: The branched bush-like thallus of lichens.

thám-nó-hi-a, s. [Gr. θάμνος (thamnos) = a bush, a shrub, and βίος (bios) = life.]

Ornith.: A genus of Saxicolinae, with ten species, from the Ethiopian region and India to the foot of the Himalayas.

thám-nó-cál-g-mús, s. [Lat. thamn(um) = a shrub, and calamus = a reed.]

Bot.: A genus of Bambusideæ. Thamnocalamus spathiflorus is a small bamboo, growing in the Himalayas, and yielding a fibre.

thám-nó-phile, s. [THAMNOPHILINÆ.]

Zool.: A member of the sub-family Thamnophilinae (q.v.).

thám-nó-phí-li'-næ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. thamnophilus]; Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -inæ.]

Ornith.: American Bush-shrikes; a sub-family of Formicariidae, with ten genera, from the forest districts of equatorial America. Bill long, keel moderate, tip hooked, base with bristles; wings arched; tail long; tarsi broadly scaled; outer toe united to middle at base.

thám-nóph'-y-lús, s. [Gr. θάμνος (thamnos) = a thickset, and φίλος (phílos) = to love.]

Ornith.: The type-genus of Thamnophilinae (q.v.), with forty-seven species, from tropical America. Nostrils at side of base of bill, rounded and exposed; wings rounded, fourth to seventh quills longest; tarsi with transverse scales before and behind.

tha-mýn, s. [Native name.]

Zool.: Rucervus eldi, Eld's Deer, so called from Captain Eld, who discovered it in 1838. It abounds in the swamp lands of Burmah, and extends as far east as the island of Hainan. It differs from the Swamp Deer (q.v.), only in the form of its antlers, the royal being represented by a small snag.

thán, *thanne, *thén, *thenne, *thon, *thonne, conj. [A.S. thanne = than; cogn. with Dut. dan = than, then; Goth. than = then, when; Ger. dann = then; denn = for, then, than; Lat. tum = then. Thann is the same word as then, but differentiated in usage.]

[TEXT.] A particle used after certain adjectives and adverbs, expressing comparison or diversity, such as more, better, worse, rather, else, or the like, for the purpose of introducing the second member of the comparison. Then is usually followed by the object compared in the nominative case: as—

"What I should be, all but less than he Whom thunder hath made greater."
Milton: P. L., l. 257.

But sometimes the object compared is put in the objective case: as—

"Which when Peleezebub perceived—than whom, Satan except, none higher sat—with grave Aspect he rose."
Milton: P. L., li. 299.

In such cases than may be looked upon as a proposition. The second member or object of comparison is frequently a clause introduced by that: as, I had rather do this than that you should suffer; and that is frequently omitted: as—"I had rather all myself than they Should not produce fair issues."

Shakspeare: Winter's Tale, II. 1.

Zool.: Poisonous Colubrine Snakes; a sub-order of Ophidia (q.v.), with two groups, Proteroglyphia and Solenoglyphia. (See these words.)

tháne, *thayne, *thein, s. [A.S. thegen, theyn, thén = a thane; prop. = mature, grown up, from thigen, pa. par. of théhan = to grow up, to be strong; cogn. with Icel. thegn; Ger. degen = a warrior, from geidgen, pa. par. of M. H. Ger. athen; O. H. Ger. athen; Ger. gesehen = to grow up, to become mature.]

[TEXT, v.] A title of honour or dignity among the Anglo-Saxons. In England a freeman not noble was raised to the dignity of a thane by acquiring a certain amount of land (five hides in the case of a lesser thane), by making three sea voyages, or by receiving holy orders. The thanes had the right of voting in the Witenagemot, not only of their own shires, but also of the whole kingdom, on important questions. There were two orders of thanes: the king's thanes, or those who attended at his court and held lands immediately from him, and ordinary thanes, or lords of the manor, and who had a particular jurisdiction within their limits. On the cessation of his actual personal service about the king, the thane received a grant of land. After the Norman conquest, thanes and barons were classed together, and the title fell into disuse in the reign of Henry II. In Scotland, thane signified originally a count or earl, one who ruled a county, or even in some cases a province. Afterwards the title was applied to a class of non-military tenants of the crown, and continued in use till the end of the fifteenth century.

"Of Fyfe Makduff that tunc the Thane." Wintoun: Chronicle, VI. xix. 2.

thane-lands, s. pl. Lands granted to thanes.

tháne'-dóm, s. [Eng. thane; -dom.] The district or jurisdiction of a thane.

thánk (pa. t. thanked, *thonked), v. t. [A.S. thancian, from thanc, thome = thought, thanks; Dut. danken; Icel. thakiss; Dan. takke; Sw. tacka; Ger. danken; Goth. thagjan = to think.] [THANK, s.] To express gratitude to for a favour; to make acknowledgment of gratitude to for benefits, favours, or kindnesses.

"Thank him not for that which he doth say."
Shakspeare: Sonnet 79.

¶ (1) It is often used ironically:

"That Portugal hath yet no more than a suspension of arms, they may thank themselves, because they came so late into the treaty; and, that they came so late, they may thank the Whigs, whose false representations they believed."—Swift.

(2) I thank you (commonly shortened into thank you): An expression of thanks for some kindness or act of politeness. It is also frequently used in declining an offer or request, whether seriously or ironically.

"No, I thank you, forsooth, heartily."—Shakspeare: Merry Wives, I. 1.

(3) I will thank you: A colloquial phrase of politeness used in introducing a request, and equivalent to, Will you oblige me by doing, giving, or handing so-and-so: as, I will thank you to shut the door.

thánk, s. [A.S. thanc, thonc = thought, grace, favour, content, thanks; allied to thank, and cogn. with Dut. dank; Icel. thökk; Dan. tak = thanks, tanke = thought; Sw. tack; Ger. dank; Goth. thaghs.]

1. An expression of gratitude for a favour; an acknowledgment of gratitude for a benefit, favour, or kindness. (Now used exclusively in the plural.)

"Thanks be to God which giveth us the victory."—1 Corinth. xv. 57.

2. Good-will, gratitude, thankfulness.

¶ (1) It is often used ironically:

"It is a sight but rarely noted,
Thanks to man's wrath and woman's pride."
Scott: Rokeby, v. 6

(2) Thanks; a common contraction for I give (offer, tender, &c.) thanks, thanks be to you, or the like.

thank-offering, s. An offering made as an expression of gratitude or thanks; an offering for benefits received.

"The altars ran with the blood of victims killed as thank-offerings."—Etton: Origins of Eng. Hist., p. 261.

*thank-ly, adv. [Eng. thank; -ly.] Thank-fully.
"Ye givevth frankly what we thankly spend." Spenser: Du Bartas; Third Day, First Week, 809.

*thanks-give, v.t. [Eng. thanks; -give.]
To celebrate or distinguish by solemn rites in token of thankfulness; to give thanks for.
"To thankgive or bless a thing in a way to a sacred use he took to be an offering of it to God." Mede.

thanks-giv-er, s. [Eng. thanks, and giver.]
One who gives thanks; one who acknowledges a kindness or benefit.
"The devout thanksgiver, David, continually declaring the great price he set upon the divine favours." Barrow: Sermons, vol. 1, ser. 8.

thanks-giv-ing, *thankes-giv-yng, s. [Eng. thanks, and giving.]
1. The act of rendering or returning thanks or of expressing gratitude for benefits or kindness.
"The aged have had longer experience of God's mercies than younger; but this matter for thanksgiving." Necker: Sermons, vol. II, ser. 8.
2. A public celebration or acknowledgment of divine goodness; a day specially set apart for religious services as an acknowledgment of the goodness of God as shown either in any remarkable deliverance from calamity or in the ordinary dispensation of His bounties.
"Thanksgiving Day was first established in the United States by the Pilgrims at Plymouth, in 1621. It became a recognized holiday in New England, replacing Christmas as the great family festival, and has been generally adopted in other parts of the country. Congress recommended days of thanksgiving annually during the Revolution, and Washington in 1789, after the adoption of the Constitution. Other days of national thanksgiving have been proclaimed, and since 1863 the last Thursday in November has been annually proclaimed by the Presidents as a national Thanksgiving-day.
3. A form of words expressive of thanks to God, as a grace or the like.

thán-nah, s. [Hind.] [TANNA.]

"1. An intestine, a gut.
"Summe thay stykedethorgh gottes and thearmes." Sir Ferumbas, 767.
2. Guts or intestines twisted into a cord, as for fiddle-strings, &c. (Prowd) thát, a., pron., conj., & adv. [A.S. thæt, sing. neut. of demonstrative pronoun, frequently used as neut. of the def. article. The suffix t is the mark of the neuter gender, as in what, from who, it (orig. hit) from he, and answers to the Lat. d, as n istud, quid, id, &c. It also appears in Sansc. tat = it, that, and in the noun. neut. and oblique cases of the Greek article. Cf. Dut. de (masc. & fem.) = the; dat = that (conj.); Icel. that = the; Dan. den (masc. & fem.), det (neut.) = the; Sw. den (masc. & fem.), det (neut.) = this; Ger. der (masc.), die (fem.), das (neut.) = the; dass = that (conj.); Goth. thata, neut. of def. article; Russ. tote (masc.), to (fem.), to (neut.) = that.]

A. As adjective:
I. Used as a definite adjective before a noun:
1. Used to point to a person or thing before mentioned, or supposed to be understood; or used to designate a specific person or thing emphatically, having more force than the definite article, which may, however, in some cases be substituted for it.
"The woman was made whole from that hour." Matthew ix. 22.
2. Used in opposition or contradistinction to this, and designating one of two objects already mentioned, and generally the one more remote in time or place. [ll. 2.]
"This clerke said ye, that other said." Gower: C. A. (Prol.)
3. Used almost as equivalent to such, and serving to point not so much to persons or things as to their qualities; occasionally followed by as or that as a correlative.
"Whose love was of that dignity That it went hand in hand even with the vow." Shakesp.: Hamlet, I. v.

II. Used absolutely or without a noun:
1. Used to designate a person or thing already mentioned, referred to, implied, or otherwise indicated.
"The measure is English heroic verse without rhyme, as that of Homer in Greek, and of Virgil in Latin." Milton: P. L. (The Verse.)
2. Used in opposition to this, or by way of distinction: as, This is dark, that fair. When this and that are used to refer to persons or things already mentioned or indicated in any way, this designates the latter or last mentioned, that the former or first mentioned, in the same manner as the Lat. hic and ille, and the Fr. cet and celui. When used to denote plural nouns that takes the plural form those.
"Those are the very words." Shakesp.: Merchant of Venice, iv. 1.
3. Used in place of a sentence, or part of a sentence, or a series of sentences.
"Whom Moses heard that he was content." Leviticus x. 20.
Here that refers to the words of Aaron (Lev. x. 19). That in this use sometimes precedes the sentence or clause to which it refers.
"Tha be far from these, to do after this manner, to stye the righteous with the wicked." Genesis xviii. 25.
Here that refers to the clause in italics. That is also frequently used as a substitute for an adjective: as, "You say he is dead: that he is not." It is also frequently used to explain or add to something said or referred to.
"I heard a humming. And that a strange one." Shakesp.: Tempest, II. 1.
Sometimes it is used as equivalent to the modern colloquial use of so, as—"Ye saw the ceremony?" "That I did." Shakesp.: Henry VIII, iv. 1.
4. Used with a predicate, by way of emphatic approbation, applause, or encouragement.
"Wha, that's my dainty Ariel!" Shakesp.: Tempest, v. 1.
5. Especial, distinguished.
"Art thou that my lord Elijah?"—1 Kings xviii. 7.

6. By omission of the following relative.

(1) Equivalent to he who, she who.
"Who is that calls so oddly?"—Shakesp.: Twelfth of the Mice, iv. 1.
(2) Equivalent to what, that which.
"Have you that I sent you for?" Shakesp.: Comedy of Errors, iv. 4.

B. As a relative pronoun, that is used frequently as equivalent to who or which.
"So being that ruling engine that governs the world, it both claims and finds as great a pre-eminence above all other kinds of knowledge as government is above contemplation."—South: Sermons, vol. 1, ser. 6.

It cannot, however, be used as a relative with a preposition preceding it; but it may be so used if the preposition is placed at the end of the clause. Thus, we can say: The man of whom I spoke, or, the man that I spoke of; the house in which I live, or, the house that I live in, &c. That introduces always an adjective clause, while who or which are not always so used. To the relative use of that may be referred the cases in which it is used as correlative to so and such.
"Whose state is such that cannot choose But lend and give where she is sure to lose." Shakesp.: All's Well that Ends Well, I. 2.

C. As conjunction:
1. Used to introduce a clause which is, logically, either the subject of the principal sentence, or the object, or a necessary complement of an essential part of the principal sentence.
"Tha childish error that they are afraid." Shakesp.: Venus & Adonis, 898.

2. Used to introduce a reason; in that, because, since.
"Do not smile at me that I boast her off." Shakesp.: Tempest, iv. 1.

3. Used to denote a purpose, object, or end; equivalent to the phrases in order that, so that, to the end that.
4. Used to introduce a result or consequence, and equivalent to so that.
"At this Adonis smiles as in disdain. That in each cheek appears a pretty dimple." Shakesp.: Venus & Adonis, 248.

5. Denoting a fact supposed to be in connection with what precedes; equivalent to seeing that, it being the case that.
"Ther is something in the wind, that we cannot get." Shakesp.: Comedy of Errors, III. 1.

6. Supplying the place of a relative preceded by a preposition. [B.]
"Tha is the hour that Madam Silvia Entreated me to call." Shakesp.: Two Gentlemen, iv. 3.

*7. Used to supply the place of another conjunction in the second part of a clause.
"As if the world should cleave, and that slain men Should solder up the rift." Shakesp.: Antony & Cleopatra, III. 4.

8. Added to other conjunctions and relative adverbs without modifying their sense.
"After that the holy risen are ended." Shakesp.: Much Ado about Nothing, v. 4.

So also we find lest that, when that, where that, whilst that, &c.

9. Used elliptically to introduce a sentence or clause expressive of surprise, indignation, or the like.
"Tha a brother should Be so perfidious." Shakesp.: Tempest, I. 2.

* In that: For the reason that; seeing that; because.
10. Used similarly elliptically as an optative particle, or to introduce a phrase expressing a wish.
"O, that you bore The mind that I do." Shakesp.: Tempest, II. 1.

D. As adv.: To such a degree; so: as, He was that angry. (Vulgar.)

thatch, s. [A weakened form of that (THACK, s.), from A.S. thacc = thatch; theccan = to thatch, cover; Dut. dak = thatch, deken = to thatch; Icel. thak = thatch, thekja = to thatch; Dan. tag = thatch, tekte = to thatch; Sw. tak = thatch, täkte = to thatch; Ger. dach = thatch, decken = to thatch. thäu-män'ti-as, s. [Gr. θαύμα (thauma), genit. θαύματος (thaumatós) = a wonder.]

Zool.: A genus of Medusidæ. Body hemispherical, its circumference with tentaculiform cirrhi, bulbous at their root, the under part of the animal much excavated, with a stomachal cavity terminating by a buccal orifice. From the European and Australian coasts.

thäu-mäs, s. [Gr. θαύμα (thauma) = a marvel.]

Palæont.: The name given to some extinct forms from the Oolite, closely allied to Rhina squatina, the Angel-fish, and probably to be classed with the Rhinidae.

thäu-mä-si-te, s. [Gr. θαυμασιώ (thaumasiō) = to be surprised; suff. -ite (Mfn..)]

Min.: An amorphous mineral occurring in crevices in the Bjelke mine, Jemtland, Sweden. When first found it is stated to be soft, hardening on exposure. Hardness, 3-5; sp. gr. 1.877; lustre, greasy to dull; colour, white. Compos.: a mass of three very concordant analyses appears to justify the formula suggested by Lindström, $CaSiO_3 + CaCO_3 + CaSO_4 + 14 aq.$, which needs silica, 9-93; carbonic acid, 7-28; sulphuric acid, 13-25; lime, 27-82; water, 41-72 = 100. In view of the improbable composition, it has been attempted to show that the substance is a mixture; but by independent microscopic investigation its practically homogeneous structure has been confirmed. Still further examination is essential.

thäu-mäs-tür-a, s. [Gr. θαυμαστός (thaumastós) = wonderful, and αἶψα (aipsa) = a tail.]

Ornith.: Shearwater; a genus of Trochilidæ, with two species, from the humid districts of Peru. The genus is distinguished by the peculiarly-shaped tail, the feathers of which are pointed, the middle ones being greatly elongate. Several pairs are generally met with together. The males are generally more pugnacious, driving off every other kind of humming-bird which ventures to enter their territory. The plumage of the sexes is different, the female being much duller in colour.

* thäu-mä-tôi-a-trý, s. [Gr. θαύμα (thauma), genit. θαύματος (thaumatós) = a wonder, and λατρεία (latreia) = worship.] Excessive admiration for what is wonderful; admiration of what is miraculous.

thäu-mä-tröpe, s. [Gr. θαύμα (thauma) = a wonder, and τροπή (tropē) = a turning; τρέπω (trēpō) = to turn.] An optical toy, depending for its effects upon the persistence of vision. It consists of a circular card having strings fastened to it at the extremities of a diameter. On one side is drawn some object, as a horse, and on the other his rider, so that when the card is twirled rapidly round the rider appears to be seated on the horse.

* thäu-mä-türge, s. [THAUMATURGŪ.] A dealer in miracles; a miracle-monger.

* thäu-mä-tür-gic, * thäu-mä-tür-gic-al, a. [Eng. thaumaturgy]; -ic, -ical.] Of or pertaining to thaumaturgy, magic, or legerdemain.

"[To see] such pleasant peepers of perspective, Indian pictures made of feathers, China works, frames, thaumaturgical motions, exoticic toys, &c."—Burton: Anal. of Melancholy, p. 276.

* thäu-mä-tür-gicis, s. pl. [THAUMATURGIC.] Feats of magic or legerdemain.

* thäu-mä-tür-gist, s. [Eng. thaumaturgy]; -ist.] One who deals in wonders or believes in them; a wonder-worker.

"Cagliostro, thaumaturgist, prophet, and arch-quack."—Carlyle: Diamond Necklace, ch. xv.

thäu-mä-tür-güs, s. [Gr. θαυματουργός (thaumatourgos), from θαύμα (thauma) = a wonder, and εργον (ergon) = work.] A miracle-worker; a title given by Roman Catholics to some of their saints, specially noted for working miracles: as, Gregory Thaumaturgus (212-270). St. Bernard of Clairvaux (1091-1153) is called the Thaumaturgus of the West.

thäu-mä-tür-gý, s. [Gr. θαυματουργία (thaumatourgia), from θαύμα (thauma), genit. θαύματος (thaumatós) = a wonder, and εργον (ergon) = work.] The act of performing miracles or wonders; wonder-working, magic, legerdemain.

"That man, who, after such thaumaturgy, could go down to Stratford and live there for years."—Lowell: Among My Books, p. 172.

thäve, s. [THAËVE.]

thäw, * thow-en, v.i. & t. [A.S. thawian, thawan; cogn. with Dut. doofjen = to thaw, from dooi = thaw; Ice. thýja = to thaw, from thá = thaw; Sw. töa = to thaw, from tö = a thaw; Sw. töa = to thaw, from tö = a thaw; Ger. thauen = to thaw.]

A. Intransitive:

I. Literally:

1. To melt, dissolve, or become liquid, as ice or snow.

"Long tedious courtship may be proper for cold countries, where their frosts are long a thawing; but, heav'n be praised, we live in a warm climate."—Dryden: An Evening's Love, l. 2.

2. To become so warm as to melt ice or snow. (Said of the weather, and used impersonally.)

II. Fig.: To become less cold, reserved, or formal; to become more genial.

B. Transitive:

1. Lit.: To melt, to dissolve, as ice or snow; to free from frost, as frozen ground.

"Time, never wandering from his annual round, Bids zephyr breathe the spring, and thaw the ground."—Cooper: Key v. (TRANS.)

2. Fig.: To render less cold, formal, or reserved; to make more genial.

thäu, s. [THAW, v.]

I. Literally:

1. The reduction of snow or ice to a liquid state by the increasing heat of the sun, or by the accidental passage of warmer currents over the frozen mass. The dissolution of the ice particles in the atmosphere creates a humidity, which is perceptibly felt. During thaw there is a sensation of greater cold than during the previous frost, owing apparently to caloric being carried away from the body by the evaporation of the moisture on the skin.

2. Warmth of weather, such as liquefies or melts things frozen.

"They soon after, with great joy, saw the snow fall in large flakes from the trees, a certain sign of an approaching thaw."—Cook: First Voyage, bk. I., ch. iv.

II. Fig.: The state of becoming less cold, formal, or reserved.

"But were a man in a mountain of ice, yet if the Sun of Righteousness should arise upon him, his frozen heart shall feel a thaw."—Bunyan: Pilgrim's Progress, pt. II.

* thäu-lëss, a. [Eng. thaw; -less.] Unthawed, unthawing.

"The pure air, even on this lower ledge of a thousand feet above sea, cherishes their sweetest scents and liveliest colours, and the winter gives them rest under thawless severity of snow."—Ruskin, in St. James's Gazette, Feb. 9, 1856.

* thäu-y, a. [Eng. thaw; -y.] Growing liquid; thawing.

thē, def. art. [A.S. ðe, more commonly se, the masc. nom. of the definite article: se, seo, ðæt [THAT]; O.Sax. ðe; O. Fris. thē, thī; Dut. & Low Ger. de; Sw. & Dan. den; Ger. der. The A.S. definite article was inflected like an adjective for number, gender, and case. The, before a comparative, is the old instrumental thē: as, the more = Lat. eo magis.]

1. Used before nouns with a specifying and limiting force; as: the twelve apostles; The sun is the source of light and heat.

2. Used before a noun in the singular number, to denote a species by way of distribution or a single thing representing the whole: as, The grasshopper shall be a burden.

3. Used before abstract nouns; seemingly used in a general sense, but in fact restricted by their particular application.

"The grand debate, The popular harangue, The tart reply, The logic, and the wisdom, and the wit, And the loud laugh—I long to know them all; I hurn to see The furious'd wranglers free, And give them voice and ut'rance once again."—Cooper: Task, lv. 30-34.

4. Used before proper names by way of emphatic distinction, or before family names with something of the force of a title: as, The Macnab, The O'Donoghue, The O'Connor Don, &c.

5. Prefixed to adjectives used absolutely, giving them the force and functions of abstract names: as, the sublime, the beautiful, the real, the ideal, &c.

6. Used before adjectives and adverbs in the comparative degree, with the force of by that, by so much, by how much, on that account: as, the sooner the better.

* thē, v.i. [THEE, v.] To thrive, to prosper; to have good luck.

"So the thē, quod he."—Chaucer: C. T., 5, 362.

thē-a, s. [Chinese tea = tea.]

Bot.: Tea; a genus of Ternströmiaceæ. Flowers pendent; sepals five, persistent, with bractæ at their base; petals five, seven, or eight, the inner series the larger one; stamens in two rows, the inner or free series as many as the petals; styles three; fruit three-celled, capsular, spheroidal, with each cell usually one-seeded, the capsule ultimately splitting through the cells into three valves, each with a partition down the middle. Known species six, the leaves of only one of which are made into tea. [TEA-PLANT.] Griffith considered the genus not to be properly distinct from Cainella, which, however, has the sepals numerous and deciduous, the free stamens twice as many as the petals, five as the normal number of styles, and flowers erect. Most modern botanists therefore keep the two genera separate.

* thē-ā-gē-æ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. the(a); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -accæ.]

Bot.: Mirbel's name for Ternströmiaceæ (q.v.).

T'-head, s. [Eng. T, and head.] A cross-bar with two prongs on the end of a dog-chain, watch-chain, or elsewhere, to engage in a ring.

thē-ād, s. [Mod. Lat. the(a); Eng. suff. -ad.]

Bot. (PL.): The Ternströmiaceæ. (Lindley.)

thē-ān'-drie, a. [Gr. θεανδρικός (theandrikos), from θεός (theos) = God, and άνθρωπος (ánthrōpos), genit. άνθρώπου (ánthrōpou) = a man.] Relating to or existing by the union of divine and human operation in Jesus Christ, or the joint agency of the divine and human nature.

Theol.: A term introduced in the seventh century to express that unity of operation in the two natures and the two wills of our Lord Jesus Christ, by which they act as the natures and wills of one indivisible Person, God and Man. (Blunt.) thē-ān-thrōp-īc, thē-ān-thrōp-īc-ā-l. a. [Gk. θεός (theos) = god, and άνθρωπος (anthrōpos) = s. man.] Partaking both of the divine and human nature.

thē-ān-thrō-pīsm. s. [THEANTHROPIC.]

- 1. A state of being both God and man.
- 2. A conception of God or of gods, as possessing qualities essentially the same as those of men, but on a grander scale. (Gladstone.)

1. Government by God; theocracy.
2. A body of divine rulers; an order or system of gods or deities.

thē-ā-tēr, a. [THEATRE.]

thē-ā-tēr-ī-an, s. [Eng. theater; -ian.] An actor.
"Players, I mean theaterians."—Decker: Sattromatis.

thē-ā-tine, †thē-ā-tin, *Tē-ā-tin, a. & s. [Sea def. B.]

A. As adj.: Of, belonging to, or connected with this congregation described under B.
"The Theatine Nuns were founded by the Blessed Ursula Benincasa, who died in 1513."—Adis & Arnold: Cath. Dict., p. 192.

B. As substantive:
Church Hist.: Any member of a congregation of Regular Clerks, which derived its name from Theate (now Chieti), a fortified city of the Abruzzo, of which John Peter Caraffa, one of the founders of the Congregation, was Bishop. Associated with Caraffa, were St. Cajetan, Paul Consigliari, and Boniface de Colle, the first steps towards the formation of the new congregation were taken in 1524, and in the following year it was approved by Pope Clement VII. The object of the founders was the promotion of spiritual life among Christians and the removal of irregularities among the secular clergy. The members took the three vows, and practised rigid poverty, for they even abstained from asking alms. In the popedom of Caraffa, who was elected in 1555, and took the title of Paul IV, the congregation spread over the Continent, but is at present confined to Italy.

thē-ā-tral, thē-ā-tral, a. [Fr., from Lat. theatralis.] Pertaining or belonging to a theatre or theatres; theatrical.

"In theatral actions he personates Herod in his majesty."—Comment on Chaucer (ed. 1695), p. 23.

thē-ā-tre (tre as tēr), thē-ā-tēr (Amer.), *teatre, s. [Fr. théâtre, from Lat. theatrum; Gr. θέατρον (theatron) = a place for seeing shows; θέασις (theasmos) = to see; θεα (thea) = s. sight; Sp., Port., and Ital. teatro.]

I. Literally:

1. A building devoted to the representation of dramatic spectacles; a play-house. Amongst the Greeks and Romans theatres were the chief public edifices next to the temples, and many of them were of enormous size. The theatre of Marcellus at Rome, the external walls of which are still in existence, contained seats for 30,000 spectators. The Greek theatres were semicircular; that part in which the chorus danced and sang was called the orchestra; behind this, and facing the audience, was the stage for the performers who took part in the drama; the back of the stage being filled in by a permanent architecturally decorated scene. Roman theatres also formed semicircles with seats rising in the form of an amphitheatre for the spectators, at the chord of which was the stage (scena), with its permanent decorations. The orchestra, which was the space between the stage and the lowest tier of spectators, was employed by the Greeks for theatrical purposes, whereas the Romans turned it into seats for the senators. The topmost tier was generally crowned with a covered portico. The whole mass of the rows of seats was supported by a solid substructure of piers and arches, which formed passages of three stories one above another, retaining the circular form of the building; whilst externally they formed arcades, which were surrounded with half-columns or piers with entablatures over them. The exterior of the straight portion of the building, which contained the stages and some chambers connected with it, was generally surrounded by a portico. The theatres were either open, or were protected against the sun and rain by an awning stretched over them. The scena consisted of the scenae in a restricted sense, answering to the modern scene, and the pulpitum or stage.

THEATRE OF DIONYSOS.

The scene itself, in accordance with a critical canon observed with much solicitude by the Grecian dramatists, was very rarely changed during the course of the same play, although the scena frons, the turning scene, and the scena frons, the shifting scene, were not altogether unknown. The pulpitum again was divided into the proscenium, or space in front of the scene, where the actors stood while actually engaged in the business of the play, and the postscenium, or space behind the scene, to which they retired when they made their exits. Modern theatres are generally constructed on a semicircular or horse-shoe plan, with galleries running round the walls. The portion of a modern theatre corresponding to the ancient orchestra is occupied mainly by spectators, the orchestra taking up only a small part of it next to the stage. In some small theatres the laud is under the stage.

"The building was a spacious theatre, half-round on two main pillars vaulted high. With seats where all the lords and each degree of sort, might sit in order to behold."
Milton: Samson Agonistes, l. 605.

2. A room, hall, or other place, generally with a platform at one end, and ranks of seats, rising as they recede, or otherwise arranged so as to afford the spectators a full and unobstructed view of the platform. Such rooms are used for public lectures, anatomical demonstrations, surgical operations &c.

II. Figuratively:

1. A place rising by steps or gradations like the seats in a theatre.
"Shade above shade, a woody theatre Of steepest view."
Milton: P. L., lv. 141.

2. A place, scene, or sphere of action or exhibition; a scene or field of operations; the scene or locality where a series of events takes place: as, the theatre of war.

Patent theatre: A theatre existing by right of letters patent, as distinguished from one holding a licence from the Lord Chamberlain. (See extract.) (English.)

"Owing to their being the two patent theatres, Drury Lane and Covent Garden have each at their doors a guard of honour of six soldiers, furnished by the household troops. . . . The guard, we believe, is the sole relic of the exclusive royal patent under which these two theatres so long existed."—Walford: Old & New London, iii. 237.

theatre-goer, s. A playgoer; one who frequents theatres.

theatre-going, s. The practice of frequenting theatres.

"Up in Wheens we have not got reconciled to theatre-going yet."—St. James's Gazette, June 2, 1887.

thē-āt-ric-al, *thē-āt-ric, a. [Lat. theatricus, from Gr. θεατρικός (theatricos).]

1. Of or pertaining to a theatre or to scenic representations; resembling the manner of dramatic performers.

"The people in general fonder of theatrical entertainment."—Goldsmith: Politic Learning, ch. xii.

2. Calculated for display; pompous.

"But whichever we do, neither our language should be florid, nor our manner theatrical."—Becker: Works, vol. v., Charge 1.

3. Meretricious, artificial, false.

thē-āt-ric-al-ī-ty, s. [Eng. theatrical-ity.] The quality or state of being theatrical; anything that is theatrical; theatrical display. (C. Kingsley: Alton Locke, ch. vi.)

thē-āt-ric-al-ize, v. t. [Eng. theatrical-ize.] To cast in a dramatic form.

1. In a theatrical manner; in a manner suiting the stage; Farrar: Early Days of Christianity, ch. . . .

2. With vain pomp, show, or ostentation; with false glitter; unreal.

thē-āt-ric-als, s. pl. [THEATRICAL.] All that appertains to a dramatic performance, especially such a performance in a private house: as, private theatricals.

thē-ā-trō-phōne, s. A telephone by means of which the words and music of a theatrical performance may be heard at a distance by non-spectators.

thēave, thēve, s. [Cf. Welsh daftad = a sheep, a ewe.] A ewe of the first year.

thē-bā-ī-a, s. [THEBAINE.]

thē-bā-īd, s. [See def.] A poem concerning Thebes. There were several such; but the name is given, by way of pre-eminence, to a Latin heroic poem in twelve books written by Statius, born A.D. 61, died A.D. 96.

thē-bā-īno, s. [Named from Thebes, in Egypt, from the vicinity of which comes some of the opium of commerce.]

Chem.: C₁₉H₂₁NO₈. Thebala. One of the less important bases existing in opium. Obtained by treating the extract of opium with milk of lime, washing the precipitate with water, and after drying, exhausting it with boiling alcohol. On evaporation a residue is obtained, from which ether dissolves out the thebaine. It crystallizes from alcohol in quadrate tablets, having a silvery lustre, tastes acrid, and is extremely poisonous. It melts at 125°, is insoluble in water, very soluble in alcohol and ether, and is colored deep red with sulphuric acid.

Thē-ban, a. & s. [See def.]

A. As adj.: Pertaining or relating to Thebes.
B. As subst.: A native or inhabitant of Thebes.

Theban-legion, s. [THUNDERING-LEGION, 2.]

Theban-year, s.
Ancient Chron.: The Egyptian year, which consisted of 365 days 6 hours.

thē-bō-lac-tic, a. [Eng. theb(ain), c. connect., and lactic.] Derived from or pertaining to thebain and lactic acid.

thebolactac-acid, s.
Chem.: C₃H₅O₃. An acid isomeric or identical with lactic, and found in the mother liquors of morphine. It is said that some of its salts differ from those of ordinary lactic acid. Turkey opium yields about two per cent. as lactate of calcium.

thē-ca, s. [Lat., from Gr. θήκη (thēkē) = a case, a box, a chest.]

1. Anat.: A sheath, specif. applied to the sheath enclosing the spinal cord, formed by the dura mater.

†2. Botany:
(1) An anther. (Grew.)
(2) Used in the plural of (a) the sporangia, capsules, or conceptacles of ferns; (b) the sporangia or capsules of mosses; (c) the sporangia, foliiculi, or involucrens of Equisetaceae; (d) the sporocarpia, conceptacles, or capsules of Lycopodiaceae; and (e) the asci of Lichens and Fungals.

3. Palaeont.: A genus of Hyaletida. Shell straight, conical, tapering to a point, back flattened, aperture trigonal. Possibly a subgenus of Orthoceras. Forty species; from the Silurozoic Rocks.

bēl, bōy; pōūt, jōwl; cat, yell, chorus, chin, bench; go, gem; thin, this; sin, as; expect, Xenophon, exist. ph = f -cian, -tian = shan. -tion, -sion = shūn; -tion, -sion = zhūn. -cious, -tious, -sious = shūs. -ble, -dle, &c. = bpl, dpl

4. Zool.: A sheath or receptacle; specif. the wall of a sclerodermic corallum. In some cases it is strengthened by an epitheca.

thē-cāg'-ēr-a, s. [Gr. θήκη (thēkē) = a sheath, and κέρα (keras) = a horn.]

Zool.: A genus of Doridæ (q.v.), with two species, from a quarter to half an inch long, found round the British coasts at low water.

thē-ca-dāc'-tŷl, s. [THECADACTYLUS.] Any individual of the genus Thecadactylus (q.v.).

† thē-ca-dāc'-tŷl-ūs, s. [Gr. θήκη (thēkē) = a case, and δακτύλος (daktulos) = a finger.]

Zool.: A genus of Geckotidæ, or a sub-genus of Gecko (q.v.). Toes half-webbed, no femoral pores, tail uniformly granular.

thē-cal, a. [THECA.] Of or pertaining to a theca.

thē-cāph'-ōr-a, s. pl. [Lat. theca, and Gr. φάρος (pharos) = bearing.]

Zool.: The same as SEPTULARIDA. (Hinks.)

thē-ca-phōre, s. [THECAPHORA.] Bot.: The stalk of an ovary; spec., the long stalk supporting the ovary in Passiflora, &c. Called also Gynophore, Basigynium, and Podogynium.

thē-ca-spōre, s. [Lat. theca, and Gr. σπόρος (sporos), σπώρα (spora) = a seed.]

Bot. (Pl.): Spores in asci, ascospores, and endospores. So named to distinguish them from Basidiospores or Stylospores.

thē-ca-spōr-ōūs, a. [Eng. thecaspor(e); -ous.] Of or pertaining to fungi which have their spores in theca.

thē-ci-a, s. [Mod. Lat., from theca (q.v.)] [THECIDÆ.]

thē-ci-dæ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. thec(ia); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -idæ.]

Palæont.: A family of Tabulata, with a single genus Thecia, confined to the Silurian. Corallum compound, septa present, tabula well developed. Its precise affinities are obscure, and it should probably be regarded as one of the Alcyonaria.

† thē-ci-di-f-dæ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. thecid(ium); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -idæ.]

Zool. & Palæont.: A family of Brachiopoda, now usually merged in Terebratulidæ (q.v.).

thē-pid'-i-ūm, s. [Mod. Lat., dimia. from Gr. θήκη (thēkē) = a sheath.]

1. Bot.: Mirbel's name for an Achenium (q.v.).
2. Zool. & Palæont.: A genus of Terebratulidæ, or Thecididæ. Shell thickened, with granulated border; fixed to sea bottom by the substance of the beak of the ventral valve; structure punctated; oral processes united in the form of a bridge over the visceral cavity; curved arms folded upon themselves, and supported by a calcareous loop. One recent species, Thecidium radians, from the Mediterranean; fossil thirty-four, from the Trias onward.

thēc'-ia, s. [Lat. = a Christian martyr of unknown date.]

Entom.: Hair-streak; a genus of Lycaenidæ. Fore wings wholly dark brown, or with a large blotch of some other colour, or with pale markings near the hinder margin; hind wings with a transverse pale line below, which is entire, interrupted, or nearly obsolete. Larvæ feeding on trees, shrubs, or papilionaceous plants. Five species are British. Thecla rubi, the Green Hair-streak, has the under side of the wings green; the rest have not this character. T. betulae, the Brown Hair-streak, has the under side of the hind wings with two slender white streaks. T. pruni, the Dark Hair-streak, has an orange band with a row of black spots; T. abum, the Black Hair-streak, a black line; and T. quercus, the Purple Hair-streak, has two small orange spots instead of the band. The first of the five is the most common.

† thē-cō-dōnt, a. & s. [THECODONTIA.]

A. As adj.: Of or belonging to the Thecodontia (q.v.); having the teeth fixed in distinct sockets.

"In some respects the Thecodont Reptiles make an approach to the Lacertilians, while in others they approximate to the Deinosauria. Upon the whole, however, they would seem to be best regarded as an ancient group of Amphibolous Crocodiles, distinguished by their compressed, trenchant, and serrated teeth."—Nicholson: Palæont., II. 213

B. As subst.: Any individual of the Thecodontia (q.v.).

† thē-cō-dōn'-tŷ-a (tŷ as shi), s. pl. [Gr. θήκη (thēkē) = a case, and ὀδούς (odontos), genit. ὀδόντος (odontos) = a tooth.]

Palæont.: An order of Reptilia founded by Owen. Vertebral bodies biconcave; ribs of trunk long and bent, the anterior ones with a bifurcate head; limbs ambulatory, femur with a third trochanter; teeth with the crown more or less compressed, pointed, with trenchant and finely-serrate margins, implanted in distinct sockets. Two genera, Thecodontosaurus and Palæosaurus, from the Trias, near Bristol. (See extract under THECODONT, A.) Huxley regards them as Dinosaurian.

thē-cō-dōn'-tō-sāu'-rūs, s. [Gr. θήκη (thēkē) = a case; ὀδούς (odontos), genit. ὀδόντος (odontos) = a tooth, and σαύρος (sauros) = a lizard.] [THECODONTIA.]

thē-cō-mē-dū'-gæ, s. pl. [Gr. θήκη (thēkē) = a case, and Mod. Lat. medusa, pl. of medusa (q.v.).]

Zool.: Allman's name for an order of Hydrida formed by him for the reception of Sirophacoscypus mirabilis. [STEPHANOSCYPUS.]

thē-cō-smī'-lŷ-a, s. [Gr. θήκη (thēkē) = a case, and σμίλη (smilē) = a knife for cutting.]

Palæont.: A genus of Actinozoa. One species from the Rhætic or Lower Lias; twenty-one from the Jurassic rocks of Britain, and others from the Cretaceous and Tertiary.

thē-cō-sō-ma-ta, s. pl. [Mod. Lat., from Gr. θήκη (thēkē) = a case, and σῶμα (sōma) = the body.]

Zool.: A section of Pteropoda (q.v.). Animal with external shell; head indistinct; foot and tentacles rudimentary, combined with the fins; mouth situated in a cavity formed by the union of the locomotive organs; respiratory organ contained within a mantle cavity. There are two families: Hyalæidæ and Limacinaidæ.

thē-cō-sō-ma-toūs, a. [THECOSOMATA.] Of, belonging to, or resembling the Thecosomata. (Nicholson: Palæont., II. 48.)

thē-cō-spōn'-dŷl-ūs, s. [Gr. θήκη (thēkē) = a case, and σπώνδυλος (spondulos), σφόνδυλος (spondulos) = a vertebra.]

Palæont.: A genus of Crocodilia. One species from the Wealden.

thēc'-tō-dūs, s. [Gr. θηκτός (thēktos) = sharpened, whetted, and ὀδούς (odontos) = a tooth.]

Palæont.: A genus of Cestracritidæ ranging from the Trias to the Chalk.

* the-dome, s. [Mid. Eng. thee, v.; -dom.] Prosperity, success, fortune.

"Evil thedome on his monks' abouts." Chaucer: C. T., 9, 102.

* thēe-ly, adv. [Mid. Eng. thee = thief; -ly. Like a thief; in the manner of a thief.]

thēft, * theft, s. [For theft, from A.S. theafte, theofthe, thysfthe, from theof, thiof, thēf = a thief; theoflan = to steal; cogn. with O. Fris. thysfthe, from thiof = a thief; Icel. thysfth, thysf, from thysfr = a thief.]

1. The act of stealing or thieving. In law, the same as LARCENY (q.v.). In Scots Law, theft is defined as "the intentioned and clandestine taking away of the property of another from its legitimate place of deposit, or other locus tenendi, with the knowledge that it is another's, and the belief that he would not consent to its abstraction, and with the intention of never restoring it to the owner."

"His thefts were too open; his alching was like an unskilled thief, he kept not time."—Shakspeare: Merry Wives, l. 3.

* 2. That which is stolen.

"If the theft be certainly found in his hand alive, whether of ass, or sheep, he shall restore double."—Exodus xxii. 4.

* theft-bote, s.

Law: The receiving of a man's goods again from a thief, or a compensation for them by way of composition, and to prevent the prosecution of the thief.

"Of a nature somewhat similar to the two last species of offences, is theft-bote; which is where the party robbed not only knows the felon, but also takes him back again, or else enters into an agreement not to prosecute. This is frequently called compounding of felony; and formerly was held to make a man an accessory; but is now punished with fine and imprisonment. To advertise a reward for the return of things stolen, or lost, with no questions asked, or words to the same purport, subjects the advertiser and the printer or publisher to a forfeiture of £50 to any person who will sue for the same, who is entitled also to his full costs of suit."—Blackstone: Comment., bk. IV., ch. 10.

* thēft-ŷ-ōūs, a. Eng. theft; -uous.]

1. lit.: Dishonest; inclined, or inclining to acts of theft; involving theft.

2. Fig.: Hidden, sly, underhand.

"When you have read the article of greatest celebrity in the current number of a periodical, you find that there has been no other motive to it than a thēftuous hope to amuse an hour for you after dinner by serving up to you again the plume from some book."—Mason: De Quincey; English Men of Letters, p. 138.

thē-gith'-ōr, adv. [See def.] A Scotch form of Together (q.v.).

"This bed looks as if it's the collers in Sanguhar had been in 't together."—Scott: Guy Rannering, ch. xlv.

* thēgn (g silent), s. [THANE.]

* thēgn'-hoqd (g silent), s. [THANEHOOD.]

thē-i-form, a. [Mod. Lat. thea, and Eng. form.] Having the form of tea.

thē-i-na, s. [THEINE.]

thē-ine, s. [Mod. Lat. the(a); -ine.]

Chem.: C₈H₁₀N₂O₂. An organic base, occurring in tea-leaves, in Paraguay tea, guarana, and in small quantities in cocoa seeds. It is also formed synthetically from theobromine by union with methyl, yielding methyl-theobromine, or theine. To prepare it from tea the leaves are extracted with hot water, the solution precipitated with lead acetate, and the filtrate freed from lead by sulphydric acid. On evaporation of the solution and allowing it to stand for some time, the theine crystallizes out. Purified by animal charcoal it forms tufts of white silky needles, slightly soluble in cold water and alcohol, melting at 225°, and subliming unchanged at a higher temperature. Tea leaves contain from two to four per cent. of theine, to which the stimulating effect of tea is partly ascribed.

thēi-ō-thēr'-mīn, s. [Gr. θείον (theion) = sulphur; θερμός (thermos) = heat, and -mīn (Chem.).] [PLOMBIERIN.]

thēr, * thair, * thar, a. or poss. pron. [Orig. not a possessive pronoun, but the genit. plural of the definite article; from Icel. therra; O. Icel. thera = of them; A.S. dhæra, dhæra, genit. pl. of æ or ðe = the; Ger. der, genit. plural of the definite article; Goth. thize, fem. thizo, genit. pl. of sa, so, thatu = the. Hir, hire or here was formerly used for thair, from A.S. hira = of them, genit. pl. of he = he.] [THAT, THEV.] Of or belonging to them; pertaining to them: as, their house, their land, their lives, &c.

thērs, a. or pron. [Formed from their on analogy of ours, yours; Cf. Dan. deres; Sw.

fate, fat, fare, amidst, what, fall, father; wō, wēt, hère, camél, hër, thère; pine, pit, sire, sir, marine; gō, pōt, or, wōre, wōlf, work, whō, sōn; mūte, cūb, cūre, unīte, cūr, rūle, fūll; trŷ, Sŷrian. æ, œ = ē; ey = ā; qu = kw.

deus = theirs.] Their. Like ours and yours, theirs may be used absolutely, and as a nominative, objective, or simple predicate.

"An eye more bright than theirs." Shakespeare: Sonnet 20.

thē-ism, s. [Gr. θεός (theos) = a god; Fr. théisme.]

1. The belief in a God, as distinguished from atheism. In this sense Christians, Jews, Muhammadans, &c., are all theists. Etymologically viewed, theism (from the Greek) and deism (from the Latin) both mean belief in a God. In the early part of the seventeenth century the word Deism fell into some discredit, and after a time the term Theism was used in its stead. [DEIST, DEISM.]

2. The belief in a God and in natural religion combined with disbelief in revelation. [THEISTIC-CHURCH.]

thē-ist, s. [Gr. theism; Fr. théiste.] A believer in the existence of a God, as opposed to an atheist.

"The word deist, or theist, in its original signification, implies merely the belief of a God, being opposed to atheist; and so there may be deists of various kinds."—Waterland: Christianity Falsified, p. 62.

thē-ist-ic, thē-ist-ic-al, a. [Eng. theist; -ic, -ical.] Pertaining to theism or theists; according to the doctrines of theists.

"From an abhorrence of superstition, he appears to have adopted the most distant extremes of the theistic system."—Watson: Life of Thomas Paine, p. 303.

Theistic Church, s.

Church Hist.: A Church founded in London in 1871 for the purpose of promulgating the theistic views of the Rev. Mr. C. Voysey, "which the decision of the Privy Council (1870) has debarred him from preaching as vicar of Healough." Among the promoters were many eminent men, notably Dr. Patrick Black, Sir John Bowring, Charles Darwin, Sir Charles Lyell, Andrew Pritchard, Judge Stansfeld, the Right Rev. Samuel Hinde, formerly Bishop of Norwich, and many others. Their meeting-place was at first in St. George's Hall, and then in Langham Hall, afterwards they bought the Scotch Church, Swallow-street, Piccadilly. Their leading principles are:

- 1. That it is the right and duty of every man to think for himself in matters of religion.
2. That there is no quality in religious beliefs; that higher views of God are always possible.
3. That it is our duty to obtain the highest truth, and to proclaim it and to detect and controvert errors.
4. That religion is based on morality.
5. That Theism is not aggressive against persons, only against erroneous opinions.

Their belief may be summarized thus:

- 1. That there is one living and true God, and there is no other God beside Him.
2. That He is perfect in power, wisdom, and goodness, and therefore every one is safe in His everlasting care.
3. Therefore that none can ever perish or remain eternally in suffering or in sin, but all shall reach at last a home of goodness and blessedness in Him.

thē-kōl, s. [Chilian name.]

Pharm.: The purgative diuretic infusion of the leaves of Cheraodtia chilensis.

thē-lēph-ōr-a, s. [Gr. θηλή (thēlē) = a teat, a nipple, and φόρος (phoros) = bearing.]

Bot.: A genus of Arriolarini, now limited to fungals, whose hymenium shows slight traces of papillae or veins, and is confluent with the pileus, which is fibrous and has no cuticle. Found in the tropics of America, in Britain, &c.

Thē-lūs-sōn (Th as T), s. [See def. of compound.]

Thellusson's Act, s.

Law: The Act 39 & 40 George III., c. 98 occasioned by the will of Peter Thellusson, who died in London July 21, 1798. He possessed £4,000 a year and £600,000 of personal property, and wished it to accumulate after his death for so long a time that it was calculated that it would have amounted to £18,000,000. The Act restricted such accumulations.

thē-lō-dūs, s. [Gr. θηλή (thēlē) = a nipple, and δούς = a tooth.]

Palæont.: A provisional genus of Cestraciones, founded on shagreen scales from the Ludlow bone-bed.

thēl-phū-qa, s. [Lat., from Gr. Τέλφουσα (Telphousa) = a nymph who gave her name to a town in Arcadia.]

Zool.: Thetype genus of Thelphusidæ (q.v.). Carapace flat, smooth, broad, and heart-shaped; external antennæ very short, placed near footstalks of eyes. Thelphusa furcillata, the best-known species, is from the south-east of Europe.

thēl-phū-sī-an, s. [THELPHUSA.] Any individual of the Thelphusidæ (q.v.).

thēl-phū-sī-dæ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. thelphus(a); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -idæ.]

Zool.: A family of Brachyurous Crustaceæ. Carapace more or less oval; eye footstalks short, fourth joint of jaw feet not inserted into external angle of preceding joint. There are three or four genera, and most of the species are tropical or sub-tropical, and live in the earth near the banks of rivers or in humid forests, bearing a strong analogy to Land-crabs.

thē-lŷg-ō-nŷm, s. [Lat. thelygonon; Gr. θελυγονον (thelygonon) = a plant supposed to assist the procreation of females; θελυγονος (thelygonos) = begetting girls; θήλυς (thēlyus) female, and γονή (gonē) = offspring.]

Bot.: A genus of Cheucopodiaceæ. Only known species Thelygonum Cynocrambe, the κυνοκράμβη (kynokrambē) of Dioscorides, is a somewhat acrid plant abounding in acicular saline crystals, and is slightly purgative. It is sometimes used as a potherb. It is a native of the countries bordering the Mediterranean.

thē-lŷ-mī-tra, s. [Gr. θηλυμίτρα (thēlymitrēs) = in woman's clothes; θήλυς (thēlyus) = female, and μίτρα (mitra) = a belt or girdle.]

Bot.: The typical genus of Thelymitridæ (q.v.). Orchids with fasciated or tuberous roots, one solitary sheathing leaf, with loose spikes of blue, white, pink, or yellow flowers. Chiefly from Australia and New Zealand.

thē-lŷ-mī-tri-dæ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. thelymitr(a); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -idæ.]

Bot.: A family of Neottææ.

thē-lŷph-ō-nid-a, s. [THELYPHONIDÆ.] Any individual of the Thelyphonidæ (q.v.).

"Thelyphonidæ approach nearer than the Scorpions to the structure of the true spiders."—Encyc. Brit. (9th. edh.), ii. 235.

thē-lŷ-phōn-ī-dæ, s. pl. [THELYPHONIDES.]

thē-lŷph-ō-nid-ō-a, s. pl. [Mod. Lat., from thelyphonus (q.v.), and Gr. εἶδος (eidos) = form, appearance.]

Zool.: An order of the Class Arachnida. Cephalothorax similar to that of the Scorpions, bearing also visible traces of its soldiered segments; abdomen segmented, and united to cephalothorax by a pedicel, but never throughout its entire breadth. There are three families, all tropical.

thē-lŷ-phōn-ī-dēs, a. pl. [Mod. Lat. thelyphon(us); Lat. masc. or fem. pl. adj. suff. -idēs.]

Zool.: The type-family of Thelyphonidæ, with one genus, Thelyphonus (q.v.). The abdomen terminate with three post-abdominal segments, to which is attached a many-jointed setiferous tail.

thē-lŷph-ō-nūs, s. [Gr. θηλυφόνος (thēlyphonos) = killing women; θήλυς (thēlyus) = female, and φόνος (phonos) = killing; * φέω (phēnō) = to kill.]

Zool.: The type-genus of Thelyphonidæ (q.v.), with twenty-nine species, confined to the tropical regions of Asia, America, and Australasia. They are nocturnal or crepuscular, living by day in damp places under the bark of old trees; when disturbed they hold up the palpi, as if for defence, and beat a rapid retreat, with the tail erect.

thēm, pron. [A.S. thām, them, dat. of thā = they; Icel. theim; Dan. and Sw. dem.] [THEY.] The dative and objective case of they; those persons or things; those.

"How much more shall your Father which is in heaven give good things to them that ask him."—Matt. vii. 11.

thē-māt-ic, a. [Gr. θέμα (thema), genit. θέματος (thematos) = a theme.] Pertaining or relating to, or containing a theme or themes.

"It must be clear that the oratorio stands or falls by the success or failure of its thematic method."—Field, April 7, 1886.

thematic-catalogue, s.

Music: A catalogue giving the opening theme of each piece of music contained in it.

thēm-a-tist, s. [THEMATIC.] A writer of themes.

thēma, *tēma, *thēam, *thēama, s. [O. Fr. tema (Fr. thème), from Lat. thema; Gr. θέμα (thēma) = that which is laid down, the subject of an argument; τίθημι (tithēmi) = to place; Sp., Port., & Ital. tema.]

I. Ordinary Languages:

1. A subject or topic on which a person writes or speaks; anything proposed as a subject of discussion or discourse.

"Her favourite theme was the doctrine of non-resistance."—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. 11.

2. Discourse on a certain subject.

"It was the subject of my theme." Shakespeare: Comedy of Errors, v.

3. A short dissertation, composed by a student on a given subject; an essay.

"But this I say, that the making of themes, as is usual in schools, helps not one jot towards it."—Lockes On Education, § 111.

* 4. Subject, question, cause, matter.

"Here he comes, and I must ply my theme." Shakespeare: Titus Andronicus, v. 2.

* 5. That by means of which a thing is done; an instrument, a means.

* 6. A division for the purpose of provincial administration under the Byzantine Empire. There were twenty-nine themes, twelve in Europe and seventeen in Asia.

"The Prefect of Thrace was the most obnoxious agent of his master's tyranny. Throughout that theme the monks were forced to abandon their vows of solitude and celibacy under pain of being blinded and sent into exile."—Mitman: History of Latin Christianity h.c., iv. ch. viii.

II. Technically:

1. Music:

(1) One of the divisions of a subject, in the development of sonata-form.

(2) The cantus firmus on which counterpart is built.

(3) The subject of a fugue.

(4) A simple tune on which variations are made.

* 2. Philol.: A noun or verb not modified by inflections, as the infinitive mood in English; the part of a noun unchanged in inflection or conjugation.

"Let scholars daily reduce the words to their original or theme, to their first case of nouns, or first tense of verbs."—Watts.

Thēm-is, s. [Gr.]

1. Gr. Mythol.: The goddess of Justice or Law, daughter of Heaven and Earth, and mother by Jupiter of the Fates, the Seasons, Peace, Order, Justice, and all deities beneficial to mankind. She is generally represented in a form resembling that of Athēnē, but carrying the horn of plenty in one hand and a pair of scales in the other.

2. Astron.: [ASTEROID, 24].

THEMIS.

Thē-mis-ti-ā-ni, Thē-mis-ti-ān-s, s. pl. [AΘΝΟΤΕΛΑ]

thēm-sōlvēs, reflex. pron. [Eng. them, and selves.] An emphatic and reflexive form of the third plural personal pronoun; their own selves; their own persons, &c. (Used as the plural of himself, herself, and itself.) [HIMSELF.]

"They open to themselves at length the way." Milton: P. L., vii. 118.

thēn, *than, *thane, *thenne, adv. & conj. [Orig. the same word as than (q.v.), but afterwards differentiated; A.S. dhænne, dhænne, dhonne; Goth. than; Ger. dann = then, at that time.]

A. As adverb:

1. At that time; referring to a time specified either past or future.

"Then thou wast not out three years old." Shakespeare: Tempest, i. 2.

2. Afterward; soon afterward or immediately; next.

"Life, says Seneca, is a voyage, in the progress of which we are perpetually changing our scenes; we first leave childhood behind us, then youth, then the years of ripened manhood, then the better and more pleasing part of old age."—Bambler, No. 102.

boil, bōy; pōut, jōwl; cat, cell, chorus, çhin, bench; go, gem; thin, this; sin, as; expect, Xenophon, exist. -iŷg- -cian, -tian = shan. -tion, -sion = shün; -tion, -sion = zhün. -cious, -tious, -sious = shüs. -ble, -dle, &c. = bēl, dēl

3. At another time: as, now and then = at one time and another.

¶ Then is used elliptically for then existing, then being.

"The then bishop of London, Dr. Laud, attended on his majesty throughout the whole journey."—Clarendon.

B. As conj.: In that case; therefore; consequently; for this reason; this being so.

"Let reason then at her own quarry fly, But how can finite grasp infinity?"—Dryden's Hind & Panther, l. 104.

¶ I. But then: But on the other hand; but notwithstanding; but in return.

2. By then:

(1) By that time. (Colloq.)

(2) By the time when or that.

3. Till then: Until that time.

"Till then who know The force of those dire arms?"—Milton: P. L., l. 98.

then-a-days, adv. In those days; in times past; correlative to now-a-days.

then'-al, a. [THENAR.] The same as THENAR (q.v.).

then'-ar, s. & a. [Gr. θεναρ (thenar), from θενεις (thenein), 2 aor. infin. of θεινω (theinō) = to strike.]

A. As substantive:

Anat.: The palm of the hand or the sole of the foot.

B. As adj.: Of or pertaining to the palm of the hand or to the sole of the foot.

thenar-eminence, thenar-prominence, s.

Anat.: The fleshy mass constituting the ball of the thumb. It consists of four muscles: the abductor pollicis, the opponens pollicis, the flexor brevis pollicis, and the adductor pollicis.

Then'-ard, s. [THENARDITE.] (See compound.)

Thenard's blue, s. [COBALT-BLUE.]

then'-ard-ite, s. [After the French chemist, L. J. Thenard; suff. -ite (Min).]

Min.: A soluble mineral, forming large deposits in Spain, Arizona, U.S.A., and other places. Crystallizing orthorhombic, with a basal cleavage. Hardness, 2 to 3; sp. gr. 2.55; lustre, vitreous; colour, white; sometimes brown. Compoa.: soda, 56.3; sulphuric acid, 43.7 = 100, which corresponds to the formula, NaO SO₄.

thence, *thane, *thene, *thanene, *thennes, *thens, adv. [A.S. dhanan, dhanon, dhanonne, dhanonne = thence; cogn. with O. H. Ger. dhanân; Ger. dannen.]

1. From that place or quarter.

Invoke thy aid to my adventurous song,"—Milton: P. L., l. 13.

2. From that time; thenceforth.

"There shall be no more thence an infant of days,"—Isaiah lvi. 20.

3. For that reason; from that source; from out of this.

"Not to sit idle with so great a gift Useless, and thence ridiculous about him,"—Milton: Samson Agonistes, l. 600.

*4. Not there; elsewhere; absent.

"Who would be thence that has the benefit of access?"—Shaksp.: Winter's Tale, v. 2.

¶ From thence: A pleonastic but well authorized expression.

"I was not sick of any fear from thence,"—Shaksp.: Sonnet 88.

thence'-forth, *thennes-forth, *thens-forth, adv. [Eng. thence, and forth.] From that time; thereafter.

"If the salt hath lost its savour . . . it is thenceforth good for nothing."—Matthew v. 13.

¶ Thenceforth is frequently preceded by from, a pleonasm, but sanctioned by good usage.

"From thenceforth Pilate sought to release him."—John xix. 12.

thence'-for-ward, adv. [Eng. thence, and forward.] From that time or place onward.

"When he comes to the Lord's table, every communicant professes to repent, and promises to lead a new life thenceforward."—Lectures.

thence'-from, adv. [Eng. thence, and from.] From that place.

*thennes, *thens, adv. [THENCE.]

*thennes-forth, adv. [THENCEFORTH.]

thē-ō, pref. [Gr. θεός (theos) = God.] The first element in many words derived from the Greek referring to the Divine Being or divinity.

thē-ō-brō'-ma, s. [Pref. theo- = god, and Gr. βρώμα (brōma) = food.]

Bot.: A genus of Byttnerææ. Small trees, with large simple leaves, and the flowers in clusters. Sepals five; petals five, hooded, ligulate at the apex, stamens five, each with double anthers, and a horn-like appendage between the filaments; styles filiform; fruit large, five-celled; stigma five-parted; mors or less pentagonal fruits, with a thick tough rind, seeds embedded in pulp; albumen none; cotyledons thick, oily, wrinkled. Theobroma Cacao, the Cacao-tree, is sixteen or eighteen feet high, with large, oblong, entire, acuminate, smooth leaves; clusters of flowers, with the calyx rose-coloured and the petals yellowish. Fruit six to ten inches long, Branch of Cacao-tree, flower, and fruit three to five broad, with ten elevated longitudinal ribs. The ripe fruits are yellow. Each contains between fifty and a hundred seeds. These, slightly fermented, constitute the cocoa. Great forests of the Cacao tree exist in Demarara. It is also cultivated extensively in the West Indies, and grows as far north as Mexico, and has been introduced into India and Ceylon. A concrete oil, obtained by expression and heat from the ground seeds, is used as an emollient. It does not become rancid, and on that account is largely used in European pharmacy for the preparation of suppositories and pessaries.

THEOBROMA. Branch of Cacao-tree, flower, and fruit.

thē-ō-brō'-mic, a. [Mod. Lat. theobrom(a); -ic.] Derived from Theobroma Cacao.

theobromic-acid, s.

Chem.: C₈H₁₂O₆. Obtained from cacao-butter by saponification, and fractional distillation of the product. It melts at 72°-73°, and distils at a higher temperature without decomposition.

thē-ō-brō'-minē, s. [Mod. Lat. theobrom(a); -inē.]

Chem.: C₇H₉N₃O₂. An alkaloid present in the seeds of Theobroma Cacao, to the extent of from one to two per cent. It can be obtained by treating a hot-water extract of the ground beans with acetate of lead, removing excess of lead with sulphuric acid, evaporating the solution, and extracting the theobromine with alcohol. It forms short prismatic crystals, having a bitter taste, slightly soluble in water and alcohol. It is neutral, but unites with acids forming crystalline salts. Heated to 100° with methyl iodide it is converted into methyl-theobromine or theine.

*thē-ō-chris'-tic, a. [Pref. theo-, and Gr. χριστός (christos) = anointed; χρισ (chris) = to anoint.] Anointed by God.

thē-ō'-ra-çy, s. [Gr. θεοκρατία (theokratia) = the rule of God: θεός (theos) = god, and κρατός (kratos) = strength, government, power; Fr. théocratie.]

1. Government of a State by the immediate direction of God; a state of civilization and religion in which the political power is exercised by a sacerdotal caste; as in the case of the Israelites, with whom the theocracy lasted till the time of Saul.

"Thus the Almighty becoming their king. In as real a sense as he was their God, the republic of the Israelites was properly a theocracy; in which the two societies, civil and religious, were of course intricately incorporated."—Warburton: Divine Legation, bk. vi., § 2.

2. A state governed by the immediate direction of God.

thē-ō'-ra-sy, s. [Gr. θεοκρασία (theokrasia), from θεός (theos) = god, and κράσις (krais) = a mixture,]]

1. Ord. Lang.: A mixture of the worship of different gods.

2. Anc. Philos.: The intimate union of the soul with God in contemplation, which was considered attainable by the Neoplatonists.

thē-ō-crāt, s. [THEOCRACY.] One who lives under a theocracy; one who is ruled in civil affairs directly by God.

thē-ō-crāt'-ic, thē-ō-crāt'-ic-al, a. [Fr. théocratique.] Of or pertaining to a theocracy; administered by the immediate direction of God.

"But you say, when the Jewish government became a monarchy, it lost its theocratic form—in part it did."—Günther: Hints for Sermons, § 2.

*thē-ō-di-çæ'-a, s. [THEODICY.]

thē-ō-di-çæ'-an, a. [Eng. theodicy; -an.] Of or pertaining to theodicy (q.v.).

thē-ōd'-i-çy, s. [Gr. θεός (theos) = God, and δικη (dikē) = justice.]

Philos.: A vindication of the Deity in respect of the organization of the world, and the freedom of the human will. The term is specially applied to a defence of Theism against Atheism, which Leibnitz undertook by publishing, in 1710, his Essai de Théodicée, respecting the goodness of God, the liberty of man, and the origin of the Bible. [OPTIMISM, l.]

"Among the infinite of possibilities, God, being good, must have chosen that which is best. And what is best? That which presents the most perfect order and harmony. The basis of all philosophy, therefore and according to Leibnitz) will be the conviction that whatever is is for the best; that every thing is good, harmonious and beautiful. Philosophy is a Theodicy."—G. H. Lewes: Hist. Philos. (ed. 1880), II. 372.

thē-ōd'-ō-lite, s. [Etym. doubtful; perhaps from Gr. θεώμα (thēoma), for θεώματι (thēomati) = to see; δόξ (hodos) = a way, and λιτός (litos) = smooth, even, plain. It occurs in Blount, ed. 1674.] A most important instrument for measuring horizontal and vertical angles, but particularly adapted for accurately measuring the former. Its principle is identical with that of the altitude and azimuth instrument; the construction and purpose of the two, however, differ, the latter being employed for astronomical purposes, while the theodolite is used for land surveying; but the better instruments of this class may be employed for observing the altitude of celestial bodies. The vertical circle is not generally, however, of sufficient size, nor so graduated as to be available for very accurate astronomical observations. In the cut which shows the form known as a Y theodolite, from the shape of the rests in which the telescope is free to rotate, it is an ordinary refracting telescope, having in the principal focus of its object-glass an arrangement of fibres of unspun silk, called cross-wires. One of these fibres is level when the instrument is correctly set up, and two others like the letter X, intersect at a point in the first.

THEODOLITE.

When a point is to be viewed with the telescope, the telescope is moved so that the image of the point coincides with the intersection of the cross wires. The vertical limb z is divided into degrees, and is capable of being read by means of the vernier and the microscope a, to thirds of a minute. A pair of plates, A and B, constituting at their edge the horizontal limb of the instrument, are free, when unclamped, to move independently of each other. The plate A carries a magnetic compass and two spirit levels, c and e, at right angles to each other, by means of which the horizontal plane may be brought accurately into the horizontal plane by raising or depressing it by means of the screws, b b. The plate A is furnished with two verniers a, a, diametrically opposite to each other, the degrees marked on which are read off by the microscope d. c is the vertical axis, and the whole upper portion of the instrument may rotate about c, except when c is clamped by means of the screw g; the screw A gives an azimuth fāte, fāt, fāre, amidst, whāt, fāl, father; wē, wēt, hēre, camēl, hēr, thère; pine, pīt, sīre, sīr, marine; gō, pōt, or, wōre, wōlf, wōrk, whō, sōn; mūte, cūb, cūre, unīte, cūr, rāle, fāl; trȳ, Sȳrian, pē, œ = ē; ey = ā; qu = kw.

motion after the screw g has been tightened. By the motion of the telescope D, on the horizontal axis of the vertical limb E, altitudes and vertical angles can be measured, while, by its motion on the vertical axis C, the angular distances between two objects can be ascertained by the readings on the horizontal circle A. Before using a theodolite, it should be properly adjusted; that is, the different parts should be brought to their proper relative positions. The theodolite is in adjustment when the following conditions are fulfilled: 1. When the intersection of the cross-wires is in the axis of the telescope; that is, in the line which remains fast when the telescope is turned in the Y'a; 2. When the axis of the attached level is parallel to the axis of the telescope; 3. When the axes of the levels on the horizontal limb are perpendicular to the axis of the horizontal limb; and 4. When the axis of the vertical limb is perpendicular to the axis of the horizontal limb.

theodolite-magnetometer, s. An instrument employed as a declinometer to measure variations in declination, and as a magnetometer in determinations of force.

thē-ō-d-ō-lit-ō, a. [Eng. theodolite(s); -ic.] Of or pertaining to a theodolite; made by means of a theodolite: as, theodolitic observations.

Thē-ō-d-ō-si-an, a. [See def.] Pertaining or relating to the Emperor Theodosius (A.D. 401-450), or to the code of laws compiled under his direction.

Thē-ō-d-ō-ti-an (ti as shi), s. [See def.] Ecclesiology & Church History (Pl.):

1. A sect named after Theodotus, a tanner of Byzantium, who, apostatizing during a Roman persecution (A.D. 192) palliated his fall by representing that Jesus, notwithstanding his miraculous conception, was only a man. He [Theodotus], therefore, had denied man, and not God.

2. The followers of a disciple of the former, a banker, also called Theodotus, who organized the sect, A.D. 210. He held that Jesus, though born a man, became God at his baptism. Some of Theodotus's followers thought that Jesus did so at his resurrection, and some not at all. Called also Melchisidicians (q.v.).

theofthe, s. [THEFT.]

thē-ō-g-ōn-ic, a. [Eng. theogony(s); -ic.] Of or relating to theogony.

"One appertains to an earlier theogonic scheme."—Gladstone: Juvenius Mundi, ch. vii.

thē-ō-g-ō-nism, s. [Eng. theogony(s); -ism.] The same as THEOGONY (q.v.).

thē-ō-g-ō-nist, s. [Eng. theogony(s); -ist.] One who is versed in or writes on theogony.

"Such theologians as these, who were theogonists."—Cudworth: Intell. System, p. 114.

thē-ō-g-ō-nŷ, s. [Lat. theogonia, from Gr. θεογονία (theogonia) = the origin of the gods (the title of a poem by Hesiod), from θεός (theos) = god, and γενέω (genō) = generation, from same root as γενός (genos) = race; γίγνομαι (gignomai) = to become; Fr. théogonie; Sp. & Ital. teogonia.] Originally, the name given to the class of poems which treated of the generation and descent of the gods; hence, that branch of heathen theology which taught of the origin or generation of the gods.

"The theogonia, or poems which trace the descent of the gods."—Cox: Intro. to Mythology, p. 35.

thē-ō-g-ō-gāl, s. [THEOLOGUS.]

1. Classic: A term applied by the classic authors to treatise on the nature and worship of the gods, such as the Works & Days of Hesiod, and the de Natura Deorum of Cicero. Aquinate (De Civitate) quotes Eusebius and Varro as dividing theology into three kinds: the fabulous, that of the poets; the natural, that of the philosophers; and the political, that of the priests and the common people. The first and second kinds could be changed according to the will of the investigators; but the last could not be altered without national consent.

2. Christian: The science which treats of divine things, especially of the relations of man to God. Doctrinal formulas are recognized in Scripture, which uses such expressions as "the mysteries of God" (1 Cor. iv. 1), "the form of sound words" (2 Tim. i. 13), "sound doctrine" (Titus i. 9); but the term theology does not occur, though the elements of which it is compounded are found in close connection, τὰ (α) λόγια (logia), τοῦ (του) Θεου (Theou) = the oracles of God (Rom. iii. 2; cf. also 1 Peter iv. 11). Theology is primarily divided into Natural and Supernatural, or Revealed; the former deduced by reason from a survey of the universe, the latter founded on revelation. Natural religion is recognized in Scripture (Pa. xix. 1-6, Rom. i. 19, 20), and is held to establish the being, power, wisdom, and goodness of God, the obligation of his moral law and the folly and danger of transgressing it, and the immortality of the soul. Revealed religion is considered to superadd to these doctrines those of the Trinity, the creation and fall of man, the penalty of sin, the mission, work, and atoning death of Christ, his resurrection, ascension, and second advent, with many other doctrines. Before a theology embracing the teaching of the Bible on these subjects can be constructed, the following sciences are required: Biblical Criticism, to ascertain the exact text of certain works claiming to be inspired, and, if possible, their time, place, and human authorship; Apologetics, to establish and defend their claim to inspiration; Hermeneutics, to investigate the principles of interpretation; Exegesis, to carry those principles into practice by actual interpretation. Dogmatic Theology follows; its province being to bring together and classify the doctrines scattered through the Bible; Polemic Theology defends these against adversaries; Practical Theology reduces them to practice, and Pastoral Theology investigates the most approved methods of presenting them to the people. Throughout Scripture there is a well-marked development or evolution of doctrine from the earliest period to the close of New Testament times. The New Testament Theology constitutes the chief basis of the theologies of all churches: It was followed by that of the Apostolic Fathers, and then by that of the Fathers in general. It varied according to the idiosyncrasy of the several writers. Most doctrines were stated at first in general terms, they were then expounded and discussed by theologians, and when necessity arose, decisions of councils gave them a clear, and precise form. In mediæval times great efforts were made to state theological doctrines in language derived from the metaphysics of the age, and show their harmony; the result was the Scholastic Theology (q.v.). The application of the Commandments of the moral law to individual conduct gave rise to Moral Theology (q.v.). The Protestant Theology, which commenced with Luther and Zwingle, was professedly founded on Scripture, interpreted by private judgment, the right of exercising which was boldly asserted; that of the Roman Catholics was founded on the consensus of the Fathers, the decisions of councils, and of the Holy See, and not on the results of individual investigation. Fearless and resolute exercises of private judgment in Germany, Holland, the Protestant cantons of Switzerland, &c., has resulted in rationalism, which has also arisen in most continental countries in union with Rome, by a reaction against authority. Two theologies, one Catholic, the other Calvinist, have struggled for mastery in the Anglican Church for the last three centuries; for the century ending about 1840 the latter was dominant; since then its influence has been abridged by the Tractarian movement. Rationalism has made considerable progress within late years both in the United States and Europe, the "Essays and Reviews," published in 1860, being the first rationalistic utterance by clergymen of the Anglican Church. In the Presbyterian Church there has been of recent years a strong development of rationalistic theology, and to some extent in other Protestant churches.

thē-ōm'-a-chist, s. [Pref. theo-, and Gr. μάχη (machē) = a fight.] One who fights against the gods.

thē-ōm'-a-chŷ, s. [THEOMACHIST.]

1. A fighting against the gods, as the battle of the giants with the gods in ancient mythology.

2. A strife or battle amongst the gods.

3. Opposition to the divine will.

thē-ō-mān-çŷ, s. [Pref. theo-, and Gr. μαντεία (mantēia) = prophecy, divination.] A kind of divination, drawn from the responses of oracles, or from the predictions of sibyls and others supposed to be inspired immediately by some divinity.

thē-ō-mā-ni'-a, s. [Gr. θεομανία (theomania) = madness caused by a god.]

Mental Pathol.: A term introduced by Esquirol for a disorder in which the sufferer imagines himself to be the Deity, or that the Deity dwells in and speaks through him; used more widely to embrace religious exaltation and religious melancholy.

"An eye witness of the Irish Revivals speaks of theomania."—Bucknill & Tuke: Psychol. Med., p. 218.

Thē-ō-pās-chite, s. [Gr. θεός (theos) = God, and πάσχω (paschō) = to suffer.]

Church Hist. (Pl.): A name given to the Monophysite followers of Peter the Fuller, Bishop of Antioch, who towards the close of the fifth century, added the clause, "Who was crucified for us" to the Trisagion (q. v.).

"He undoubtedly made this addition with sectarian views, intending to establish men more firmly in his favorite doctrine, that of but one nature in Christ. But his adversaries, especially Felix of Rome and others, perverted his meaning, and maintained that he intended to teach that all the three Persons in the Godhead were crucified, and therefore such as approved this form of the hymn were called Theopaschites."—Moshem: Church Hist. (ed. Reid), p. 306.

thē-ō-pa-thēt'-īc, a. [Formed from theopathy, in the analogy of sympathetic, from sympathy.] Relating or pertaining to theopathy (q. v.).

thē-ō-pāth'-īc, a. [Eng. theopathy(y); -ic.] The same as THEOPATHETIC (q. v.).

"To deduce practical rules concerning the theopathic affections—faith, fear, gratitude, hope, trust, resignation, love."—Hartley: On Man, pt. II, ch. III, § 7.

thē-ō-p-a-thy, s. [Pref. theo-, and Gr. πάθος (pathos) = suffering.] Emotion excited by the contemplation of God; piety, or a sense of piety.

thē-ō-phān'-īc, a. [Eng. theophany(y); -ic.] Pertaining or relating to theophany; making an actual appearance to man, as a god.

thē-ō-ph-a-ný, s. [Pref. theo-, and Gr. φάω (phainō) = to appear.]

1. The manifestation of God to man by actual appearance.

"To substitute dreams for distinct, objective, divine apparitions or Theophasias."—Contemp. Rev., July, 1887, p. 28.

2. Epiphany (q. v.).

thē-ō-phīl-ān-thrōp'-īc, a. [Eng. theophilanthropy(y); -ic.] Pertaining or relating to theophilanthropism or the theophilanthropists; uniting love to God with that to man.

thē-ō-phīl-ān-thrō-pīsm, s. [Eng. theophilanthropy(y); -ism.] Theophilanthropy.

thē-ō-phīl-ān-thrō-pīst, s. [Eng. theophilanthropist(y); -ist.] One who unites love to God with love to man; an adherent of Theophilanthropy.

"The temple, the most worthy of the divinity, in the eyes of the Theophilanthropists, is the universe."—John Evans: Sketch of Denominations, p. 17.

thē-ō-phīl-ān-thrō-pý, s. [Gr. θεός (theos) = God, and φίλος (philos) = a lover of men.]

Compar. Religions: The name given to a system of natural religion which arose in the time of the first French Republic, and which had for its cardinal doctrines the adoration of God and love of man. In 1795 five heads of families—Chemin, Mareau, James, Hatty, and Mandar—associated themselves, and in December held their first meeting at a house in the Rue St. Denis for the purposes of divine worship and moral instruction, according to the dictates of natural religion. Their services consisted of moral discourses, singing, and prayer. One of their adherents was Revellière-Lépaux, a member of the Directory, who allowed them the use of the ten parish churches of Paris, which they fitted up and adorned with religious and moral inscriptions, an ancient altar, a basket of flowers as an offering to the Supreme Being, a pulpit, and allegorical paintings and banners. In 1802 Napoleon I. forbade them to hold their meetings in the churches, and after this time they no longer appear as a body.

"This religion, which consists in worshipping God and cherishing our kind, is what we express by one single word, that of Theophilanthropy."—John Evans: Sketch of Denominations, p. 19.

thē-ō-phīle, s. [Gr. θεός (theos) = God, and φίλος (philos) = dear.] One loved by God.

"Affections are the proportion of the best theophiles."—Howell: Letters, II, 41.

thē-ō-phīl-ō-sōph'-īc, a. [Pref. theo-, and Eng. philosophy (q. v.).] Combining, or pertaining to the combination of, theism and philosophy.

thē-ō-ph'-ōr-ōi, s. pl. [Pl. of Gr. θεοφόρος (theophoros) = possessed by a god, inspired; θεός (theos) = a god, and φόρος (phoros) = bearing.]

Church Hist.: A mystical name assumed by some of the early Christians, signifying that they were the temples of God (1 Cor. iii. 16). It is not unlikely that the term had special reference to the presence of Christ, God and Man, in those who had devoutly received the Eucharist. (Blunt)

thē-ō-phrās'-tā, s. [Named after Theophrastus, B.C. 371 (?)–285, a philosopher, author of The History of Plants, &c., and often called the Father of Botany.]

Bot.: The typical genus of Theophrasteae (q. v.). Only known species, Theophrasta Jusseui. It is a small tree with an unbranched stem, and a tuft of long, evergreen leaves at the top, giving it a superficial resemblance to a palm tree. Calyx and corolla campanulate, the former cartilaginous, the latter with a short tube, having a dilated throat with an angularly-lobed, fleshy ring, and a spreading limb; stamens five. Fruit, a spherical berry, with the seeds half immersed in the placenta. T. Jussieui is a native of San Domingo, and is cultivated for its fine leaves.

thē-ō-phrās'-tēs, a. pl. [Mod. Lat. theophras(a); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -ēs.]

Bot.: A tribe of Myrsinaceae (q. v.). Scales in the throat of the corolla alternate with its lobes.

thē-ōp-neūs'-tēd, a. [THEOPNEUSTY.] Divinely inspired; theopneustic.

thē-ōp-neūs'-tī-a, s. [THEOPNEUSTY.] THE SAME AS THEOPNEUSTY.

"Let them beware of conjuring enchantments or cunningly devised dogmas of Theopneustia, which will not stand the test of inquiry. Discarding all these weak defences, let them see whether the Bible is not itself Theopneustic to those who have some of the residue of the spirit by which to taste and try it."—Brit. Quarterly Review, xvii. 178. (1878.)

thē-ōp-neūs'-tīc, a. [Eng. theopneust(y); -ic.] Given by inspiration of the Spirit of God.

thē-ōp-neūs'-tý, s. [Gr. θεοπνευστός (theopneustos), from θεός (theos) = god, and πνέω (pnéō) = to breathe.] Divine inspiration; the supernatural influence of the Divine Spirit in qualifying men to receive and communicate revealed truth.

thē-or-bīst, s. [Eng. theorb(o); -ist.] One who plays on a theorb.

thē-or-bō, s. [Ital. torba; Fr. thorbe.]

Music: An old stringed instrument resembling the lute in form or tone. It had two necks, to the longest of which the bass strings were attached. It was employed for accompanying voices, and was in great favour during the seventeenth century. It differed from the lute in the possession of its two necks, whence it is sometimes called Cithara bijnje. The strings were usually single in the theorb, and when double, or tuned in octaves or in unison with the base or treble notes, the instrument was called the Arch-lute, or Chittarone.

THEORBO.

thē-ō-rēm, s. [Lat. theorem, from Gr. θεωρημα (theōrēma) = a spectacle, hence a subject for contemplation, a principle, a theorem, from θεωρῶ (theōrō) = to look al, to behold, to view; θεωρός (theōros) = a spectator; θεωραία, θεωραία (theōraia, theōraia) = to see, to view; Fr. théorème; Sp. & Ital. teorema.]

1. Geom.: A proposition to be proved; a statement of a principle to be demonstrated; that is, the truth of which is required to be made evident by a course of reasoning, called a demonstration. In the synthetical method of investigation, which is that for the most part employed in geometry, it is usual to state the principle to be proved before commencing the demonstration, which proceeds by a regular course of argumentation to the final conclusion, confirmatory of the principle enunciated. The principle being proved, it may properly be employed as a premiss in the deduction of new truths. The principle, as enunciated before the demonstration, is the theorem; its statement after demonstration constitutes a rule or formula, according as the statement is made in ordinary or in algebraic language. A theorem differs from a problem in this, that the latter is a statement of something to be done, the former of something to be proved.

2. Alg. & Anal.: Something used to denote a rule, especially when that rule is expressed by symbols or formula: as, the binomial theorem.

* 3. A speculative truth; a position laid down as an acknowledged truth; that which is considered and established as a principle.

"Questionless he (Solomon) was himself most conversant therein [theory]; for proof whereof he did leave so many excellent theorems and precepts of divinity to us."—Barrow: Sermons, vol. III, ser. 22.

¶ (1) Negative theorem: A theorem which expresses the impossibility of any assertion.

(2) Particular theorem: A theorem which extends only to a particular quantity.

(3) Universal theorem: A theorem which extends to any quantity without restriction.

thē-ō-rēm, v. t. [THEOREM, s.] To reduce to or formulate into a theorem.

thē-ō-rēm-āt-īc, thē-ō-rēm-āt-īc-al, a. [Gr. θεωρηματικός (theōrēmatikos).] Pertaining to a theorem; contained in a theorem; consisting of theorems.

thē-ō-rēm-a-tīst, s. [THEOREMATIC.] One who forms theorems; one who theorizes.

thē-ō-rēm'-īc, * thē-ō-rēm'-īc-k, a. [Eng. theorem; -ic.] Theorematic (q. v.).

"Theoremical truth, or that which lies in the conceptions we have of things, is negative or positive."—Grew.

thē-ō-rēt'-īc, thē-ō-rēt'-īc-al, a. [Gr. θεωρητικός (theōrētikos); Fr. théorétique.] Pertaining or relating to theory; founded or depending on theory or speculation; terminating in theory or speculation; not practical; speculative.

"Admirably well turned, not only for the theoretic, but also the practical behaviour of cunning fellows."—Tatler, No. 191.

thē-ō-rēt'-īc-al-ly, adv. [Eng. theoretical; -ly.] In a theoretical manner; in or by theory; according to theory; speculatively; not practically.

"Geography is . . . theoretically speaking, an essential part of the latter science."—Herschel: Astronomy, § 268.

thē-ō-rēt'-īcs, s. [THEORETIC.] The speculative parts of a science; speculation.

 thē-ōr'-īc, * thē-or-īck, * thē-or-īck, s. & a. [Gr. θεωρητική (theōrētikē); Lat. theoretica (ars); Fr. théorique.]

A. As subst.: Speculation, theory (formerly pron. thē-ōr'-īc).

"The bookish theorist, As masterly as he; more practice, without practice, Is all his soldiership."—Shakspeare: Othello, I, 1.

B. As adj.: The same as THEORETICAL (q. v.).

"We are more beholden to her for all philosophical and theoretic knowledge."—Howell: Letters, bk. II, let. 88.

theoric-fund, s. (pron. thē-ōr'-īc).

Greek Antiq.: The surplus of ordinary revenue, which, after defraying all charges of the peace establishment, was devoted to the formation of a fund for furnishing to all citizens not absent from Attica the sum of two oboli, being the price of seats at the great dramatic festivals.

thē-ōr'-īc-a, s. pl. [Gr. θεωρημα (theōrēma), neut. pl. of θεωρητικός (theōrētikos) = a spectator to a spectacle; θεωρός (theōros) = a spectator.]

Greek Antiq.: The public moneys expended in Athens on festivals and largesses.

thē-ōr'-īc-al, * thē-or-īc-all, a. [Eng. theoric; -al.]

1. Of or pertaining to theory; theoretical.

"Furnished with arts, languages, and grounds of theoretical divinity."—Bp. Hall: Specialities of his Life.

2. Pertaining to the Theorica (q. v.). (In this sense pron. thē-ōr'-īc-al.)

thē-ōr'-īc-al-ly, adv. [Eng. theoretical; -ly.] Theoretically, speculatively.

"Able to discourse theologically of the dimensions, situation, and motion, or stability of the whole terrestrial globe."—Boyle: Works, II, 287.

thē-ō-rīque (que as k), s. [Fr.] Theory.

thē-ō-rīst, s. [Eng. theory(y); -ist.] One who theorizes; one who forms theories; a speculatist.

"Truths that the theorist could never reach, And observation taught me, I would teach."—Cooper: Progress of Error, II.

thē-ō-rī-zā-tion, s. [Eng. theoriz(e); -ation.] The act of theorizing or speculating; the formation of a theory or theories.

thē-ō-rīze, v. t. [Eng. theory(y); -ize.] To form a theory or theories; to form opinions fāte, fāt, fāre, amidst, what, fāll, father; wē, wēt, hēre, camel, hēr, thēre; pine, pīt, sīre, sir, marine; gō, pōt, or, wōre, wōlf, work, whō, sōn; mūte, cūb, cūre, unīte, cūr, rūle, fūll; trý, Sýrian. æ, œ = ē; ey = ā; qu = kw.

solely by theory; to indulge in theories; to speculate.

thē-ō-ris-ēr, s. [Eng. theorist(-); -er.] One who theorizes; a theorist.

thē-ō-rī, *thē-ō-ris, s. [Fr. théorie, from Lat. theoria; Gr. θεωρία (theoria) = a beholding, contemplation, speculation; θεωρός (theōros) = a spectator; Sp. & Ital. teoria.] [THEOREM.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Speculation; supposition explaining something; a doctrine or scheme of things which terminates in speculation or contemplation, without a view to practice; hypothesis. (Often taken in an unfavourable sense, as implying something visionary.)

2. Plan or system; scheme.

3. An exposition of the general principles of any science; as, the theory of music—that is, the speculations arising from a knowledge of the principles of sound. The rules for composition and arrangement of music for voices and instruments in rhythm, melody, harmony, counterpoint, and instrumentation.

4. The science distinguished from the art; the rules of an art, as distinguished from the practice; as, the theory and practice of medicine.

II. Science: An explanation of phenomena which accounts for them so satisfactorily, that there is a high probability that the true cause of their occurrence has been pointed out. It is sometimes used in science in the same sense as hypothesis; and also in the law courts, when, for instance, in a murder case it is stated that "the theory of the prosecution is," that this or this occurred. More generally scientific men use the word to signify a hypothesis which has been established as, apparently, the true one. It is thus a stronger word than hypothesis. A theory is founded on principles which have been established on independent evidence. A hypothesis merely assumes the operation of a cause which would account for the phenomena, but has not evidence that such cause was actually at work. Metaphysically, a theory is nothing more than a hypothesis supported by a large amount of probable evidence.

thē-ō-sis, s. The ultimate absorption of the soul into deity.

thē-ō-sōph, s. [THEOSOPHY.] One who claims to have a knowledge of God, or of the laws of nature, by means of internal illumination; a mystic; a theosophist.

*thē-ōs-ō-phēr, s. [THEOSOPHY.] The same as THEOSOPHIST (q.v.).

"The great Teutonic theosopher, Jacob Behmen."—H. Brooks: Pool of Quality, l. 236.

thē-ō-sōph-ic, *thē-ō-sōph-īck, thē-ō-sōph-ic-al, a. [Eng. theosophy(-); -ic, -ical.] Pertaining or relating to theosophism or the theosophists; divinely wise.

"The outer portal of the theosophic temple."—Pall Mall Gazette, April 26, 1884.

Theosophical Society, s.

Hist. & Relig.: A society founded at New York in 1875 by Col. Olcott. Its objects are: (1) To form the nucleus of a Universal Brotherhood of Humanity, without distinction of race, creed, or colour; (2) To promote the study of Aryan and other Eastern literature, religions, and sciences; (3) To investigate unexplained laws of Nature and the physical powers of man. The society has several branches in Europe and in India. (See Olcott: Theosophy; Simeoni: Occult World.)

*thē-ō-sōph-īo-al-ly, adv. [Eng. theosophical(-); -ly.] In a theosophical manner; with direct divine illumination.

thē-ōs-ō-phism, s. [Gr. θεός (theos) = God, and σοφισμός (sōphismos); σοφός (sophos) = wise.] Pretension to divine illumination; enthusiasm.

"Many traces of the spirit of theosophism may be found."—Enfield: Hist. Philosophy, vol. II.

thē-ōs-ō-phist, s. [THEOSOPHISM.] One who cultivates or affects theosophy; one who professes to hold intercourse with God and heavenly spirits; one who pretends to derive his knowledge from divine revelation.

"The chief Theosophist of the London branch of the true believers."—Pall Mall Gazette, April 26, 1884.

*thē-ō-sō-phist-īo-al, a. [Eng. theosophist(-); -ical.] Theosophical.

*thē-ōs-ō-phise, v.t. [Eng. theosophy(-); -ise.] To treat of or to practise theosophy.

thē-ōs-ō-phny, s. [Gr. θεωσοφία (theosophia) = knowledge of divine things; θεός = God, and σοφία (sophia) = wisdom; σοφός (sophos) = wise; Fr. theosophie; Sp. & Ital. teosofia.]

Hist.: A term signifying literally "Divine Wisdom," but which has been employed to designate several systems differing widely from each other, of which the chief are:

(1) The system of the Fire-philosophers or Rosicrucians (q.v.), who claimed to be able, by a miraculous intuition of the properties of the so-called element of fire, to provide a solution, not only for every difficulty of physics, but also for every doubtful problem in the spiritual world. The leader of this movement was Paracelsus (1493-1541); it gained many adherents on the Continent, and had a celebrated advocate in England in the person of Robert Fludd (1574-1637). These Theosophists asserted that God, who is unchangeable, acts in the kingdom of grace just as he does in the kingdom of nature; so that whoever understands how natural bodies, in particular the metals, are changed, understands also what passes in the soul in regeneration, sanctification, and renovation.

(2) A form of Christian mysticism, which, excluding the dialectic processes of philosophy and the claims of authority and revelation, professed to derive its knowledge of God from direct and immediate intuition and contemplation, or from the immediate communication of God himself. Traces of this belief are to be found in the early history of the Church, but the name Theosophy, in this connection, is applied chiefly to the system developed from the writings of Jacob Böhme, or Böhmen (1575-1624), a shoemaker of Görlitz, sometimes called the "Teutonic Philosopher." He studied the Scriptures diligently, acquired some notions of chemistry and natural science, saw visions, as he believed, and came at last to consider his speculations on the Deity and origin of things as given to him by internal illumination. According to Böhme, finite existences are an efflux from the One infinite existence, and such efflux, manifesting itself in fire, light, and spirit, is a necessary attribute of God's own being. Angels and men owe their origin to the divine fire, from which light and love are generated in them. This trine life is the perfection of being, and the loss of it constituted the fall of angels and men. Christ restored to men the germ of the paradisaical life, which is possessed by all through the new birth and his indwelling. No man can be lost except by the willful destruction of the germ of the divine life. Böhme's Theosophy, however, was at the bottom thoroughly Christian. Henry More (1614-87), to some extent, adopted Böhme's opinions, as did William Law (1686-1761).

(3) Search after divine knowledge—the term divine applying to the divine nature of the abstract principle, not to the quality of a Personal God. (Olcott: Theosophy, p. 176.) Theosophy is apparently allied to Spiritualism, and, like it, is decidedly anti-Christian. Moreover it has been alleged, with some show of truth, that the so-called occult phenomena produced by some of the leading theosophists in support of their system are neither more nor less than conjuring tricks. In this country there are numerous mountebanks professing beliefs somewhat analogous to theosophy in outward form.

*thē-ō-tēch-nic, a. [Eng. theotechny(-); -ic.] Pertaining to the action or intervention of the gods; operated or carried on by the gods.

*thē-ō-tēch-nŷ, s. [Gr. θεός (theos) = God, and τέχνη (technē) = art.] The supernatural beings introduced into any piece of literary composition.

"The personages of the Homeric theotechny, under which name I include the whole of the supernatural beings, of whatever rank, introduced into the poems."—Glossaire: Jusseum Mundi, ch. vii.

thē-ō-thē-ca, s. [Pref. theo-, and Gr. θήκη (thēkē) = a case, a receptacle.] The same as MONSTRANCE (q.v.).

Thē-ōt-ō-kōs, s. [Eccles. Gr. θεοτόκος (theotokos) = bringing forth or giving birth to God; θεός (theos) = God, and τόκος (tokos) = bringing forth; τίκτω (tikto) = to bring forth.]

Church Hist. & Theol.: A title of the Virgin Mary. The word itself does not occur in the New Testament, but its equivalent ("the mother of my Lord") is found (Luke i. 43). As an ecclesiastical term it was adopted at the Councils of Ephesus (A.D. 431) and Chalcedon (A.D. 451), to assert the divinity of our Lord's Person.

"The title Theotokos, assigned to the Blessed Virgin by eminent Fathers before the Nestorian controversy (see Wright: Hist. Church, p. 302), and by the whole Church ever since the Council of Ephesus, is essentially a tribute to Christ's personal glory."—Liddon: Bampton Lectures (ed. 11th), p. 261. (Note d.)

*theo, w. [A.S.] A slave.

*theo-man, s. [A.S.] A slave, a serf, a bondman.

*ther-a-gain, adv. [Eng. there, and again.] Against that.

thēr-a-peū-gŷ, s. [THERAPEUTIC.] Therapeutics.

"And contrasted this with the hopeless scepticism of the present day, as illustrated by the conspicuous absence of therapy from the proceedings of the late International Medical Congress."—Daily News, Oct. 5, 1884.

thēr-a-peūt, s. [THERAPEUTE.] One of the Therapeutæ (q.v.).

"Philo on the Essenes and Therapeuti."—Saturday Review, Nov. 5, 1884, p. 685.

Thēr-a-peū-ta, s. pl. [Gr. θεραπεύτης (therapeutēs) = a servant; θεραπεύω (therapeuō) = to serve.]

Church Hist.: A term applied to a body of Egyptian Jews by Philo in his Contemplative Life. They arose about the end of the first century, and gave themselves up entirely to contemplation of the Deity, performing none of the duties of active life, but living in solitary cells like hermits, and meeting every Saturday, which they kept as a holy holiday, for devotion in common, after which they again retired to their respective cells, or coils, and spent their time in their ecclesial devotions. Eusebius (Hist. Eccles., lib. ii., ch. xvii.) claims them as Christian monks established by St. Mark, though without using the word Therapeutæ; and says, "Who can doubt that Philo is speaking about the customs of our people?" Others have called them Contemplative Essenes (ESSENE); Lange thought they were Oriental philosophers of melancholy temperament who had imbibed Jewish notions; and Jahnsonki considered them Egyptian priests addicted to astrology.

"I agree entirely with those who regard the Therapeutæ as being Jews claiming to be true disciples of Moses, and as being neither Christians nor Egyptians. In reality, they were wild and melancholy enthusiasts, who led a life incongruous alike with the law of Moses, and of sober reason."—Moshem: Eccles. Hist. (ed. 1841), p. 15.

thēr-a-peū-tic, a. & s. [Fr. thérapeutique, from Lat. therapeutica (ars) = (the art) of healing, from Gr. θεραπεύτικός (therapeutikos), from θεραπεύτης (therapeutēs) = a servant.] [THERAPEUTE.]

A. As adj.: Pertaining to the healing art; curative; concerned in discovering and applying remedies for diseases.

"Therapeutick or curative physick, we term that which restores the patient unto sanity, and taketh away diseases actually affecting."—Browne: Vulgar Errours, bk. iv., ch. xiii.

B. As subst.: One of the Jewish sect called Therapeutæ (q.v.).

thēr-a-peū-tic-al, a. [Eng. therapeutic(-); -al.] The same as THERAPEUTIC (q.v.).

"This remedy, in my opinion, should rather be prophylactical, for prevention of the disease, than therapeutical, for the cure of it."—Ferrand: Linn & Helwig, ch. p. 236.

thēr-a-peū-tics, s. [THERAPEUTIC.]

Med.: The science which treats of the healing of diseases. It deals with the form, manner, and time in which drugs should be administered, if needful to administer them at all; it instructs how to avoid incompatible combinations, and classifies remedial agents. (For its history in this sense, see MEDICINE, II. 3.) Therapeutics also investigates the laws of health, and how it can be preserved. [HYGIENE.] Another branch of it is DIETETICS. [DIETETIC, B.]

*thēr-a-peū-tist, s. [THERAPEUTIC.] One versed in therapeutics.

bell, bōy; pōt, jōwī; cat, cell, chorus, chin, bench; go, gem; thin, this; sin, aŷ; expect, Xenophon, exist. -ing. -clan, -tian = shān. -tion, -sion = shūn; -tion, -sion = zhūn. -cious, -tious, -sious = shūs. -ble, -dle, &c. = bēl, dēl thér'-a-pôn, s. [Gr. θεραπων (therapōn) = an attendant.]

Ichthy.: A genus of Percidæ, with about twenty species, some of which are more or less marine, spread over the Indo-Pacific. Body oblong, compressed, with scales of moderate size; teeth villiform; branchiostegals six. They are all of small size, and may be readily recognized by the blackish longitudinal bands with which the body is ornamented.

 thér'-a-pý, s. [Gr. θεραπεία (therapeia) = service, nurture.] Therapeutics.

 ther-be-forne, adv. [THEREBEFORE.]

 ther-by, adv. [THEREBY.]

thère, * ther, * thore, adv. [A.S. thar, dher; cogn. with Dut. daar; Icel. thar; Dan. & Sw. der; Goth. thar; O. H. Ger. dār, dāra; M. H. Ger. dār; Ger. da.]

1. In that place; at that place; as opposed to here, there generally denotes the place most distant, but in some cases the words are used merely in contrast-distinguishing without reference to nearness or distance.

"In crossing a heath, suppose I pitched my foot against a stone, and were asked how the stone came to be there; I might possibly answer, that for any thing I knew to the contrary it had been there for ever."—Paley: Natural Theology, ch. 1.

2. In this or that object, point, or matter; therein, in that, in this, herein.

"There art thou happy."
Shakesp.: Romeo & Juliet, III. 1.

3. At that point or stage; after going so far: as, He did not stop there.

4. Into that place; thither.

"The rarest that'er came there."
Shakesp.: Tempest, II. 1.

5. Used as an exclamation calling attention to something, as to a person, object, or statement.

"Why, there it goes."—Shakesp.: Titus Andronicus, IV. 2.

6. Used like that in interjectional phrases.

"There's a wench."—Shakesp.: Taming of the Shrew, V. 1.

7. Frequently used before the verb, when there is an inversion of the subject.

"And there came a voice from Heaven, saying, Thou art my beloved Son."—Mark I. 11.

¶ There in composition represents A.S. dhære, dat. fem. of the definite article, and is not quite the same as the adverb there. [THEREFORE.]

¶ (1) Here and there: [HERE].

* (2) Here by there: Here and there. (Spenser.)

there-right, adv.

1. Straightforward.

2. On this very spot. (Colloq.)

thère-a-bout, adv. [Eng. there, and about.]

1. About or near that place.

2. Near that number, degree, or quantity: as, There were two hundred, or thereabouts.

* 3. Concerning that.

"Much perplexed thereabout."—Luke xiv. 4.

thère-a-bouts, adv. [THEREABOUT.] Thereabout; near that number, degree, or quantity.

"Five or six thousand horse, or thereabouts."—Shakesp.: All's Well, IV. 3.

thère-af-tér, adv. [Eng. there, and after.]

1. After that; afterwards.

2. According to that; accordingly.

"Wouldst thou not eat? Thereafter as I like the giver, answered Jesus."—Wilton: P. R., II. 321.

* 3. Of or after that sort; of that kind, quality, or condition.

"My audience is not thereafter."—Latimer.

thère-a-nent, adv. [Eng. there, and anent.]

Concerning that; as regards or respects that matter or point. (Scotch.) thère-ât, * ther-at, adv. [Eng. there, and at.]

1. At that place; there.

"He opened a secret gate and out thereat conveyed her."—Chaucer: Testament of Becket.

2. At that thing or event; on that account.

"Every error is a stain to the beauty of nature; for which cause it blazeth thereat, and glorieth in the contrary."—Hooker.

thère-a-way, adv. [Eng. there, and away.]

1. Away, in that place or direction.

2. About there or that; thereabouts. (Colloq.)

 thère-bé-fóre, * there-be-forn, adv.

[Eng. there, and before.] Before that time.

"In sterres many a winter therebefore Was writ the death of Hector, Achilles."
Chaucer: C. T., 4, 639.

thère-by, * there-bl, adv. [Eng. there, and by.]

1. Annexed or attached to that.

"Well, thereby hangs a tale."—Shakesp.: Merry Wives, IV. 4.

2. By that; by that means; in consequence of that.

"As if one asking, what a fibre was? I should answer him, that it was a thing made up of several fibres; would he thereby be enabled to understand what a fibre was better than he did before?"—Locke: Hum. Underst., bk. II, ch. xlii.

3. By or near that place; near that number, degree, or quantity; thereabouts.

"Thereby a crystal stream did gently play."
Spenser: F. Q., I. 1. 34.

thère-for, ther-for, adv. [Eng. there, and for.] For that or this; for it.

"Therefor the Jews answered and said to him, what token showest thou to us that thou doest these things?"—Wycliffe: John II.

thère-fóre, adv. [A.S. fore dhære (sace) = for that (cause).] [THERE, ¶.]

1. For that; for that or this reason; referring to something previously stated.

"The Romanists say, 'tis best for men, and so suitable to the goodness of God that there should be an infallible judge of controversies on earth; and therefore there is one."—Locke: Hum. Underst., bk. I, ch. iv.

2. Consequently.

3. In return, exchange, or compensation for this or that.

"What shall we have therefor?"—Matt. xix. 27.

4. For that purpose.

"We are therefore provided."
Shakesp.: 2 Henry VI., I. 4.

¶ Therefore, that is, for this reason, marks a deduction; and consequently, that is, in consequence, marks a consequence; accordingly, that is, according to something, implies an agreement or adaptation. Therefore is employed particularly in abstract reasoning; and consequently is employed either in reading or in the narrative style; and accordingly is used principally in the narrative style.

thère-from, adv. [Eng. there, and from.] From this or that.

"Be ye therefore very courageous to do all that is written in the law, that ye turn not aside therefrom, to the right hand or to the left."—Joshua xxiii. 6.

 thère-hénce, adv. [Eng. there, and hence.] Thence.

"Whither doe I resolve to go onces more by the grace of Christ, and therehence to take my passage into Christendome over renowned Greece."—J. Taylor: Works, (1630.)

thère-in, * thar-in, * thor-in, * ther-yne, adv. [Eng. there, and in.]

1. In that or this time, place, or thing.

"And he entride into the temple; and began to cast out men sitting therein and buying."—Wycliffe: Luke ix.

2. In that or this particular point, matter, or respect.

"Therein thou wrongest thy children."
Shakesp.: 2 Henry VI., III. 2.

thère-in-tò, adv. [Eng. there, and into.] Into that place or matter.

"Let not them that are in the countries enter thereinto."—Luke xxi. 21.

thère-òf, adv. [Eng. there, and of.] Of that or this.

"In the day that thou eatest thereof, thou shalt surely die."—Genesis ii. 17.

 thér-ò-òl-ò-gíst, s. [Eng. thereology]; -ist.] One who is versed in thereology.

 thér-ò-òl-ò-gý, s. [Gr. θερῶ (therō) = to meditate; suff. -ology.] The art of healing; therapeutics.

thère-òn, adv. [A.S. dhæron.] On that or this; on it.

"And when he thought thereon he wept."—Mark xiv. 72.

thère-out, adv. [Eng. there, and out.]

1. Out of that or this; out of it.

"There came water thereout."—Judges xv. 19.

2. Without; out of doors. (Scotch.)

* 3. Therefore; in consequence of that.

"And thereout have condemned them to lose their lives."—Sidney: Arcadia, bk. III.

thère-tò, adv. [Eng. there, and to.]

1. To that or this.

* 2. Besides; over and above; to boot.

"If she be black, and thereto have a wit."
Shakesp.: Othello, V. 1.

 thère-tò-fóre, adv. [Formed from there, on analogy of heretofore.] Before that time; before that.

thère-ün-dér, adv. [Eng. there, and under.] Under that or this.

"Those which come nearer unto reason, find paradise under the equinoctial line, judging that thereunder might be found most pleasure and the greatest fertility."—Kaleph.

thère-ün-tò, adv. [Eng. there, and unto.]

1. To that or this; thereto.

"Points of ignorance pertaining therunto."
Shakesp.: Henry VIII., I. 2.

* 2. Besides; in addition.

thère-üp-òn, adv. [Eng. there, and upon.]

1. Upon that or this; thereon.

2. In consequence of that.

"Thereupon I drew my sword on you."
Shakesp.: Comedy of Errors, V. 1.

* 3. Immediately; at once.

thé-ré-va, s. [Gr. θερεῖν (thereō) = to hunt after, to chase.]

Entom.: The typical genus of Therevidæ (q.v.).

thé-ré-vi-dæ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. therea(a); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -idae.]

Entom.: A family of Notacantha, akin to Aaliidae, but having the proboscis short, and terminated by fleshy lips. The larva; which is long, lives in mould and rotten wood. The perfect insect feeds on other Diptera.

 thère-whíle, * ther-whíle, adv. [Eng. there, and while.] At the same time.

"Teaching vs therewhile, to use the most famous possible towards sinners."—Cicel: Luke xxii.

thère-wíth, adv. [Eng. there, and with.]

1. With that or this.

"I have learned in whatsoever state I am therewith to be content."—Philippians IV. 11.

* 2. Immediately.

thère-wíth-ál, adv. [Eng. there, and withal.]

1. With that or this; therewith.

2. At the same time.

"Give her that ring, and therewithal this letter."—Shakesp.: Two Gentlemen, IV. 4.

* 3. Over and above.

"Therewithal the exercise act
 On their labe further'd king they aggravated."
Donne.

thérif, * tharf, * tharfe, a. [A.S. thearf, thearf = unfermented.] Unleavened.

"The oyst schulde be of tharf brede."—Trivis: Higden, V. 9.

thérif-bread, * tharf-breed, s. Unleavened bread.

"With tharf-breed and lettuce wilde."
Cursor Munduli, 4079.

 ther-fóre, adv. [THEREFORE.]

 ther-fro, adv. [Mid. Eng. ther = there, and fro.] From that; therefrom.

 ther-gaine, adv. [Mid. Eng. ther = there, and again.] Against that.

thér-í-áo, s. & a. [Lat. theriacus; Gr. θηριακος (thēriakos)] [TREAACLE.]

A. As subst.: A name formerly given to various compositions supposed to be efficacious against poison, but afterwards restricted to what is termed Theriacal Andromach, a Venice treacle, which is a compound of sixty-four drugs, prepared, pulverized, and reduced by means of honey to an electuary.

"When the disease was young, it was mitigated with rob of elder; with crabs-eyes; spirits of hartshorn; theriac and vinegar."—The Student, II. 84.

B. As adj.: Of or pertaining to theriac; medicinal.

thé-ri-a-ca, s. [Lat.] The same as TERICIA (q.v.).

thé-ri-a-cal, * the-ri-a-call, a. [Lat. theriacus.] THE SAME AS TERICIA (q.v.).

"Theriacal trochisks, trochisks made of vipers flesh, to enter into the composition theriac, that is, treacle."—Putzsch: Glossary.

 thér-í-al, * thér-í-all, a. [TERICIA.] Theriac, medicinal.

"Yet see what account there is made of a composition called theriac, devised only for a vice and superstitious."—P. Holland: Plinie, bk. xxvii, ch. I.

thate, fát, fare, amidst, whát, fáll, father; wé, wét, hère, camél, hër, thère; pine, pít, síre, sír, marine; gö, pòt, or, wöre, wòlf, wòrk, whò, sòn; müte, cüb, cüre, unite, öür, rále, füll; trý, Sýrian. æ, œ = ö; ey = ä; qu = kw.

thēr-ī-ān-thrōp'-īc, a. [Gr. θηρίον (therion) = a wild beast, and ἀνθρώπιος (anthrōpikos) = of or belonging to man; human.]

Compar. Relig.: A term applied by Tiele [see extract] to one of his divisions of Polytheism; the other and higher stage he calls Anthropomorphic. [ZOOLOGY.]

"Most images of the gods are either human bodies with heads of animals or the bodies of animals with human heads. It is therefore we call their religion therianthropie."—Encyc. Brit. (ed. 9th), xi, 366.

thēr-ī-dī-ī-dēs, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. theridi(ōn); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -idēs.]

Zool.: A very extensive family of Dipnemonæ. Small or moderate-sized spiders, with the abdomen generally large, as compared with the cephalothorax, and broadly ovate. Fore legs usually the longest; eyes in two transverse rows. These spiders are found among foliage, and sometimes construct irregular webs. The species are most numerous in temperate climates, and the greater number belong to the Eastern hemisphere.

thēr-īd'-ī-ōn, s. [Gr. θηρίδιον (theridion) = a small animal; θηρίον (therion) = a beast.]

Zool.: The typical genus of Theridiidæ (q.v.).

thēr-īd'-ō-mūs, s. [Gr. θήρ (thēr) = a wild beast; εἶδος (eidos) = form, and μῦς (mys) = a mouse.]

Palæont.: A genus of Rodents of doubtful affinities, from the Miocene of Europe.

† thēr-ī-ō-dōnt, a. & s. [THERIODONTIA.] A. As adj.: Of or belonging to the order Theriodontia (q.v.).

B. As subst.: Any individual of the Theriodontia (q.v.). (Q. J. G. S., 1876, p. 352.)

† thēr-ī-ō-dōn-tī-a (tī as shī), s. pl. [Gr. θηρίον (therion), and δόων (odous), genit. δόωντος (odontos) = a tooth. Named from the mammalian character of the dentition.]

SKULL OF THERIODONT. a. Canine teeth. c. Canine teeth.

Palæont.: An order of Reptilia founded by Owen for the reception of a number of remains from deposits in South Africa of Triassic or Permian age. The dentition is of the carnivorous type, consisting of incisors, canines, and molars.

† thēr-ī-ō-mōr'-pha, s. pl. [Gr. θηρίον (therion) = a wild beast, and μορφή (morphē) = form.]

Zool.: Owen's name for the Tailless Amphibians (Frogs and Toads), more generally called Anoura, or Batrachia Salientia. It is a synonym of Huxley's Batrachia, a name used by Owen to designate the class Amphibia.

thēr-ī-ō-mōr'-phic, a. [THERIODORPHA.]

Compar. Relig.: Having the form of one of the lower animals. [ZOOLOGY.]

"The Egyptian gods, theriomorphic in their earliest shapes."—Nineteenth Century, Sept., 1886, p. 446.

thēr-ī-ō-sū'-chūs, s. [Gr. θηρίον (therion), and σούχος (souchos) = an Egyptian name for the crocodile.]

Palæont.: A genus of Crocodilia, with one species, from the Purbeck beds.

thēr-ī-ōt'-ō-mŷ, s. [Gr. θηρίον (therion) = a wild beast, and τομή (tomē) = a cutting.] The anatomy of animals; zootomy.

* thērma, s. [THERMA.] A hot-bath, a bath.

thēr-mēs, s. pl. [Lat., from Gr. θερμός (thermos) = hot.] Hot springs, hot baths.

thēr-mal, a. [Gr. θερμός (thermos) = hot.] Of or pertaining to heat; warm.

thermal-alarm, s. Mach.: An attachment for giving indications of a hot bearing.

thermal analysis, s. The analysis of a beam of solar light, and the ascertainment, by means of a delicate thermopile, how the temperature is affected by passing over the several colours and the invisible spectrum beyond. [SPECTRUM.]

thermal-capacity, s.

Physics: The amount of heat required to raise the temperature of a body one degree.

thermal-motor, s. A machine in which the expansion and contraction of an object or material, by changes in the temperature, is made a means of motion. The term is usually applied to a machine operated by natural thermometric changes.

thermal-springs, thermal-waters, s. pl. Hot springs.

thermal-unit, s. That quantity of heat which corresponds to an interval of 1° F. in the temperature of 1 lb. avoirdupois of water at 39°-10° F. It is to the French thermal unit (1° C. in 1 kilogramme of water) as 1 : 3.96832.

thēr-mal-ly, adv. [Eng. thermal; -ly.] In a thermal manner; with reference to heat.

thēr-mān-tī-dōte, s. [Pref. thēr-, and Eng. antidote (q.v.).] An East Indian apparatus for producing a current of air.

"The punkah would be a valuable appendage, while the thermantidote is out of the question."—Daily Telegraph, Aug. 25, 1883.

thēr-mēt'-ō-graph, thēr-mēt'-rō-graph, s. [THERMOMETOGRAPH.]

thēr-m-īo, a. [Gr. θερμός (thermos) = hot.] Pertaining or relating to heat; thermal.

Thēr-mī-dor, s. [Fr.] Literally, the Hot Month, the name given, in Oct., 1793, by the French Convention to the eleventh month of the Republican year. It commenced on July 19, and was the second summer month.

Thēr-mī-dōr'-ī-ān, s. [THERMIDOR.]

French Hist.: One of those who, in 1794, took part in the coup d'état by which the fall of Robespierre was effected. They were so called because the Reign of Terror was brought to an end on the 9th Thermidor.

thēr-mo-, thēr-m-, pref. [Gr. θερμός (thermos) = hot.] A prefix used in a number of compound words referring to heat or temperature.

thermo-barometer, s. An instrument for measuring altitudes by means of determining the boiling-point of water. They consist essentially of a small metallic vessel for boiling water, fitted with very delicate thermometers, which are only graduated from 80° to 100°; so that each degree occupying a considerable space on the scale, the tenths, and even the hundredths of a degree may be estimated, and thus it is possible to determine the height of a place by means of the boiling-point to within about ten feet.

thermo-chemistry, s.

Chem.: That branch of the science which deals with the heat liberated or absorbed during a chemical reaction; thus, 2 grams of hydrogen, in combining with 16 grams of oxygen to form water, liberates a certain definite amount of heat, viz., 60,000 calories (units of heat); whilst water, on being decomposed into its elements, is found to absorb the same amount of heat.

thermo-current, s.

Elect.: An electric current produced by the action of heat.

thermo-dynamic, a. Pertaining or relating to the relations between heat and mechanical work.

"Hence by thermo-dynamic principles, the heat converted into mechanical effect in the cycle of operations is . . ."—Everett: The C. G. S. System of Units, ch. ix, p. 54.

Thermo-dynamic valve: A valve depending for its operation upon the expansion and contraction occasioned by changes of temperature.

thermo-dynamics, s. pl.

Physics: The science which treats of the relations subsisting between heat and work.

thermo-electric, a. Pertaining or relating to electric currents or effects produced by heat.

Thermo-electric alarm: An apparatus designed to indicate the rise of temperature in bearings or shaftings, or in any kind of machinery or any branch of manufacture where a fixed temperature is desirable.

Thermo-electric battery:

Elect.: A battery in which an electric current is established by applying heat or cold.

Thermo-electric current:

Elect.: A current produced by heating some part of a suitable apparatus. So named by Professor Seebeck to distinguish it from the Hydro-electric, or ordinary voltaic current.

Thermo-electric force: The electromotive force of a thermo-electric circuit. (Everett: The C. G. S. System of Units, ch. xi, p. 74.)

Thermo-electric pile:

Elect.: A number of metallic plates of two different metals coupled in series, so that the whole of one set of the alternate junctions are at one side and the other set on the other. Antimony and bismuth are preferred, as being farthest apart of the metals ranged in thermo-electric order. By heating one set of the junctions, electricity is developed. In practice, the face of the pile, which contains one set of junctions, is turned towards the source of heat, such as a polarized beam from an electric lantern; then, a galvanometer being placed in the circuit of the pile and equilibrated, any increase or diminution of the temperature in the beam is at once shown by movement of the galvanometer needle.

Thermo-electric series:

Elect.: Metals arranged in the order of their capacity to generate a thermo-electric current when heated.

Thermo-electric value:

Elect.: The value or capability of particular metals for thermo-electric purposes. (See extract.)

"The difference of the thermo-electric values of two metals at a given temperature, t, is the electromotive force per degree of difference between the temperatures of the junction in a couple formed of those metals, when the mean of the temperatures of the junctions is t."—Everett: The C. G. S. System of Units, ch. xi, p. 75.

thermo-electricity, s.

Elect.: Electricity excited by application of heat to any suitable apparatus, usually the junction between two different metals. The discovery that it may be thus produced was made by Professor Seebeck, of Berlin, in 1821.

thermo-electrometer, s. An instrument for ascertaining the heating power of an electric current, or for determining the strength of a current by the heat it produces.

thermo-element, s.

Elect.: An element which aids in producing thermo-electricity.

thermo-magnetism, s.

Elect.: Magnetism produced by the action of heat.

thermo-siphon, s. A siphon attached to hot-water heating apparatus, invented by Kewley, of London, and Fowler, of Devonshire.

thēr-mō-cāl'-gite, s. [Pref. thērmo-, and Eng. calcite.]

Petrol.: A name given by Cordier to non-crystalline limestones, most of which enclose fossil remains and various sedimentary substances.

thēr-mōch'-rō-sŷ, thēr-mō-crōse, s. [Pref. thērmo-, and Gr. χρώσις (chrōsis) = colouring.]

Physics: (See extract.)

"Definite luminous rays being distinguished by their colours, to these different obscure calorific rays Melloni gives the name of thermocroce or heat colouring. The invisible portion of the spectrum is accordingly mapped out into a series of spaces, each possessing its own peculiar feature corresponding to the coloured spaces which are seen in that portion of the spectrum visible to our eyes."—Ganot: Physics (ed. Atkinson), § 429.

* thēr-mō-gēn, s. [Pref. thērmo-, and Gr. γεννάω (gennāō) = to produce.] An old name for caloric (q.v.).

thēr-mōg'-ēn-ōūs, a. [THERMOGEN.] Producing heat; calorific.

thēr-mō-graph, s. [Pref. thērmo-, and Gr. γράφω (graphō) = to write.] An instrument for automatically recording variations of temperature.

"Bovkett's new thermograph . . . is an instrument for recording changes of temperature, which are measured by the action of heat upon a hollow, circular metallic ring connected with a circular vessel, the whole being filled with fluid and hermetically sealed."—Nature, vol. xxiv, p. 470 (1881).

thēr-mōg'-ra-phŷ, s. [THERMOGRAPH.]

A process by which engravings are copied on metal plates, &c., by the agency of heat.

thēr, bōy; pōut, jōwi; cat, cell, chorus, chin, bench; go, gom; thin, this; sin, a; expect, Xenophon, exist. ph = f. -cian, -tian = shān. -tion, -sion = shūn; -tion, -sion = zhūn. -cious, -tious, -sious = shūs. -ble, -dle, &c. = bpl, dpl.

*thēr-mōl-ō-gŷ, s. [Gr. θερμός (thermos) = hot; suff. -ology.] A discourse on or an account of heat.

thēr-mōm-ō-tēr, s. [Pref. thermo-, and Gr. μέτρον (metron) = a measure.]

Physics: An instrument for measuring intensity of heat, or temperature, by means of expansion of a liquid or gas. Mercury is generally employed, and an ordinary thermometer consists of a spherical or cylindrical glass bulb at the end of a very fine tube, the bulb being completely filled, and the tube partly filled, with mercury, whilst the space above the mercury contains only a small quantity of mercury vapour, which offers no resistance to the expansion of the mercury. A rise of temperature is indicated by a rise of the mercury in the tube, owing to expansion; and, conversely, a fall of temperature is indicated by a fall of the mercury in the tube. A graduated scale is attached, with two fixed points: the lower, or freezing point, and the upper, or boiling point, of water. The distance between the two fixed points is then divided into a certain number of equal parts, or degrees, which are continued above and below the two fixed points. On the Centigrade or Celsius thermometer (used by scientific men everywhere, and in general use in Continental Europe), the distance between the two points is divided into 100 degrees, the freezing point being 0°, and the boiling point 100°; on the Reaumur thermometer (used only in north-western Europe), the distance is divided into 80 degrees, the freezing point being 0°, and the boiling point 80°; on the Fahrenheit thermometer (used in America and England), the distance is divided into 180°, but, since zero is 32 degrees below the freezing point, the freezing point is 32°, and the boiling point is 212°. Degrees above 0° are termed + degrees, whilst those below 0° are termed - degrees.

C. + 5 x 9 + 32 = F. | F. - 32 ÷ 9 x 4 = R.
R. + 4 x 9 + 32 = F. | C. + 5 x 4 = R.
F. - 32 ÷ 9 x 5 = C. | R. + 4 x 5 = C.
Mercury can only be used for temperatures between -40° and +675°, since it freezes at -40° and boils at +675°. For lower temperatures alcohol is used; and for high temperatures air thermometers are employed, in which changes of temperature are measured by the expansion or contraction of a known volume of air. In deep sea thermometers, used for ascertaining the temperature of the sea, the bulb is specially protected against the pressure of the water. [MAXIMUM-THERMOMETER, MINIMUM-THERMOMETER.]

thēr-mō-mēt-ric, thēr-mō-mēt-ric-al, a. [Eng. thermometer; -ic, -ial.]

- 1. Of or pertaining to a thermometer, or the measurement of heat.
2. Made, performed, or ascertained by a thermometer.

[The book] comes accompanied with some preliminaries and an appendix, whereof the former contains new thermometrical experiments and thoughts. —Boyle's Works, II. 465.

thermometric alarm, s. An instrument to release an alarm when a dangerous heat is reached in an apartment; a form of fire-alarm. One form consists of a bent glass tube with a bulb at each end, one of which with a part of the stem contains ether; the other with a part of the stem containing mercury and open to the external air. The tube is poised on its centre by gravity. Should the temperature be raised by the presence of fire, the ether would be expanded, the mercury driven into the bulb, the instrument tipped over on its axis, and the alarm sounded.

thermometric analysis, s.

Chem.: Applied to certain approximate methods of analysis, depending on the observation of the temperature when a phenomenon takes place, or of the changes of temperature accompanying chemical reactions—e.g., fixed oils evolve different degrees of heat when treated with strong sulphuric acid, and the temperatures thus produced are used to determine the proportions of two in a mixture, or to identify two oils, especially when one is a non-drying and the other a drying-oil. When 15 grms. were treated with 75 grms. sulphuric acid of 90 per cent., the following rise of temperature was observed in the three oils tested: olive-oil from 12-40°, rape-oil from 17-54°, and linseed-oil from 16-91°.

thermometric steam-gauge, s. A steam-gauge which indicates the pressure in a boiler by the amount of expansion of a fluid at the temperature due to the pressure.

thermometric-ventilator, s. A chimney-valve consisting of a circular disk accurately balanced on a spindle. On one side of the disk is an inverted siphon, open at one end and having a bulb at the other. The lower part of the siphon tube contains mercury, and the bulb is full of air. Any increase of temperature expands the air in the bulb, depresses the mercury, and opens the valve, thus allowing the air to pass.

thēr-mō-mēt-ric-al-lŷ, adv. [Eng. thermometrical; -ly.] In a thermometrical manner; by means of a thermometer.

thēr-mō-mēt-rō-graph, s. [Pref. thermo-; Gr. μέτρον (metron) = a measure, and γραφή (graphē) = to write.] [THERMOMETER.]

thēr-mō-mūl-tŷ-plŷ-ēr, s. [Pref. thermo-, and Eng. multiplier.] An instrument invented by Nobili for measuring small variations of temperature due to radiant heat. [Thermoelectric pile.]

thēr-mō-nā-trite, s. [Pref. thermo-; Eng. natron, and suff. -ite (Min.).]

Min.: An orthorhombic mineral, usually occurring as an efflorescence. Hardness, 1 to 1.5; sp. gr. 1.5 to 1.6; lustre, vitreous. Compos.: carbonic acid, 35.5; soda, 50.0; water, 14.5 = 100, which is equivalent to the formula NaOCo2 + HO. Found in lakes and about some mines and volcanoes.

thēr-mō-nŷ-trite, s. [THERMONATRITE.]

† thēr-mō-pē-gōl-ō-gŷ, s. Pref. thermo-; Gr. πηγή (pēgē) = a spring, a well, and λόγος (logos) = a discourse.]

Phys. Science: The science of the phenomena of hot springs, geysers, &c.

thēr-mō-phōne, s. [Pref. thermo-, and Gr. φωνή (phōnē) = sound.]

Physics: An instrument in which sonorous vibrations are produced by the expansion of heated bodies connected with an electro-magnet. It was first described by Theodor Wiesendanger in 1878.

thēr-mō-phŷlŷ-ite, s. [Pref. thermo-, and Eng. phylite.]

Min.: A mineral occurring in aggregated masses of small micaceous scales, which exfoliate before the blowpipe. Hardness, 2.5; lustre on cleavage faces, pearly; colour, yellowish to light-brown. It is a hydrated silicate of magnesia, which Dana includes in his group of serpentines. It has been regarded as a crystallized form of the mineral serpentine. Found at Hopansuo, Finland.

thēr-mō-pile, s. [Pref. thermo-, and Eng. pile.]

Elect.: A thermo-electric pile (q.v.).

thēr-mō-scope, s. [Pref. thermo-, and Gr. σκοπεῖν (skopein) = to see, to observe.] An instrument for indicating relative differences of temperature. The term was applied by Count Rumford to an instrument invented by him, and similar in principle to the differential thermometer of Prof. Leslie. [DIFFERENTIAL.]

"A thermoscope being carried from the bottom to the top of the hill, the included air, instead of shrinking in that colder region, manifestly dilated itself, and notably depressed the water." —Boyle's Works, I. 203.

thēr-mō-scōp-ŷc, thēr-mō-scōp-ŷc-al, a. [Eng. thermoscope; -ic, -ial.] Of or pertaining to the thermoscope; made by means of a thermoscope.

thēr-mō-stāt, s. [Pref. thermo-, and Gr. στατός (statos) = standing.] A self-acting apparatus for regulating temperatures. The name thermostat was first applied by Dr. Ure to an instrument patented by him in 1831, in which the bending of a spring composed of two unequally expansible metals, as steel and brass, was made to control a valve or damper.

thēr-mō-stāt-ŷc, a. [Eng. thermostat; -ic.] Of or pertaining to the thermostat.

thermostatic-alarm, s. A device to give a signal when a certain temperature is attained; used as a fire-alarm or as a warning of the heating of a journal, &c.

thēr-mōt-ŷc, thēr-mōt-ŷc-al, a. [Gr. θεπός (thermos) = hot.] Of or relating to heat; resulting from or depending on heat.

thēr-mōt-ŷc-s, s. [THERMOTIC.] The science of heat.

thēr-mō-tŷpe, s. [Pref. thermo-, and Eng. type (q.v.).] An impression (as of a slice of wood) taken by means of wetting with dilute acid, pressing on the object, and subsequently heating the impression.

thēr-mō-tŷp-ŷ, s. [THERMOTYPE.] The act or process of producing a thermotype.

*ther-of, adv. [THEREOF.]

thēr-ōid, a. [Gr. θήρ (thēr) = an animal, and εἶδος (eidos) = form, appearance.] Animal; having animal propensities or characteristics. Specifically applied to idiots, who in habits or appearance resemble any of the lower animals. The word is of recent introduction, but the extraordinary resemblances presented by some of the weak-minded to certain birds and mammals have attracted attention for a very long period. Pines (quoted by Bucknill & Tuke: Psychol. Med., p. 152) speaks of "a young female idiot . . . who, in the form of her head, her tastes, her mode of living, seemed to approach to the instincts of a sheep."

"The animal mind of the Theroid idiot is accompanied by appropriate animal peculiarities of body." —Nineteenth Century, Sept. 1886, p. 353.

thēr-ōl-ō-gŷt, s. [Gr. θήρ (thēr), genit. θηρός (thēros) = a wild beast; suff. -ology.] That branch of zoology that treats of the mammalia; mammalogy.

"A gentleman who, to use a newly-coined translatic word, is certainly one of the first therologists of his country." —Academy, Aug. 25, 1877.

thēr-ōp-ō-gŷt, s. [Gr. θήρ (thēr), genit. θηρός (thēros) = a wild beast; suff. -ology.] That branch of zoology that treats of the mammalia; mammalogy.

*ther-on, adv. [THERON.]

thēr-ōp-ō-dā, s. pl. [Gr. θήρ (thēr), genit. θηρός (thēros) = a wild beast, and ρῶς (rōus), genit. ρῶδος (rōdos) = a foot.]

Palæont.: An order of Cope's sub-class Dinosauria, consisting of carnivorous forms, which are believed to have preyed on the weaker herbivorous members of the class. Feet digitigrade, digits with prehensile claws; vertebrae more or less cavernous; fore limbs very small, limb bones hollow. The order comprises four families (Megalosauridae, Zanclodontidae, Amphisauridae, and Labrosauridae), and two groups or sub-orders (Caeluria and Compsognathia).

*thēr-sŷt-ŷc-al, a. [After Therastes, a fowl-mouthed character in Homer's Iliad.] Grossly abusive.

"A pelting kind of theatrical satire." —Sterne's Tristram Shandy, vi. 140.

*ther-to, adv. [THERETO.]

*ther-with, adv. [THEREWITH.]

*ther-with-all, adv. [THEREWITHALL.]

thē-rŷth-rin, s. [Pref. thŷr(i)o-, and Eng. erythrin.]

Chem.: One of the products obtained, according to Zeise, by the simultaneous action of ammoniac and sulphur upon acetone.

thē-sāu-rŷs, thē-sāu-rār-i-ŷm, s. [Lat. thesaurus; Gr. θησαυρός (thēsaurus).] A treasury; a lexicon.

thesaurus verborum, s. A treasury of words; a lexicon. Often simply thesaurus.

thēse, *thas, *thes, *theos, *thos, *thuse, pron. or a. [A.S. thās, thēs, pl. of thas = this (q.v.).] The plural of this (q.v.). These and those are used in contradiction in the same way as this and that; these referring to the persons or objects which are nearest in order or place, or were last mentioned; those to the persons or objects furthest in order, &c. "Bids these in elegance of form excel." Cooper's Retirement, 708-9.

*thō-sŷ-cle, s. [A dimin. from thesis (q.v.).] A little or subordinate thesis; a proposition.

thē-sis, s. [Lat., from Gr. θέσις (thesis) = a proposition, a statement, something laid down; from the root θέωμι (thēōmi) = to place; Fr. thèse; Sp. tesis; Ital. tesi.]

I. Ordinary Language: 1. A position or proposition which a person puts forward or advances, or offers to main-fāte, fāt, fāre, amidst, whāt, fāll, father; wē, wēt, hēre, camēl, hēr, thēre; pine, pīt, sīre, sir, marīne; gō, pēt, or, wōre, wōlf, wōrk, whō, sōn; mātē, cūb, cūre, unīte, cūr, rāle, fūll; trŷ, Sŷrian. œ, ø = ē; ey = ā; qu = kw.

talio; a subject proposed for a school or college exercise; a theme, an exercise.

"An honest but a simple pair May serve to make this thesis clear."
Prior: Paolo Purganti.

2. A theory.

"To lay down a practice of physick, conformable to his thesis of the circulation of blood."—Fuller: Worthies; Rev.

3. An essay or dissertation upon a specific subject or theme, as an essay presented by a candidate for a diploma or degree.

II. Technically:

1. Logic: An affirmation, in distinction from a supposition or hypothesis.

2. Music: The downward wave of the hand to denote the absence of accent. [ARIST.]

3. Pros.: The depression of the voice in pronouncing the syllables of a word; the part of a foot on which the depression of the voice falls. [ARIST.]

4. Rhet.: The part of a sentence preceding and corresponding to the antithesis (q.v.).

thē-sī-tim, s. [Lat. thesion, thesium = the bastard food-flax.]

Bot.: Bastard Toad-flax; a genus of Santalaceae. Flowers small, green; perianth four or five cleft, persistent; stamens with a small fascicle of hair at their base; stigma simple; ovary inferior; ovaries three; drupe ribbed, crowned with the persistent perianth. Known species about sixty, all from the eastern hemisphere, except Thesium umbellata, which is found in rocky woods in the United States and Canada. It bears small white flowers in little umbels. T. linophyllum, the Lint-leaved Toad-flax, is a British form. It is a perennial parasite on roots.

thēs-mō-phōr'ī-a, s. [Gr. θεσμοφόρος (thesmophoros) = lawgiver; an epithet applied to Demeter: θεσμός (thesmos) = law, and φορός (phoros) = bearing.]

Gr. Antiq.: A festival in honour of Ceres, or Demeter, because she first taught mankind the use of laws. It was celebrated by many cities of Greece, but with most observation and ceremony by the Athenians. The worshippers were free-born women (whose husbands defrayed the expenses of the solemnity), assisted by a priest and a band of virgins. The women were clothed in white garments, as emblematic of purity.

thēs-mō-thētē, s. [Gr. θεσμοθέτης (thesmothētēs), from θεσμός (thesmos) = law, and θέτης (thētēs) = one who places, from τίθημι (tithēmi) = to place; Fr. thesmothète.]

Gr. Antiq.: A lawgiver; a legislator; to one of the six inferior archons at Athens who presided at the election of the lower magistrates, received criminal informations in various matters, decided civil causes on arbitration, took the votes at elections, and performed a variety of other offices.

thēs-pō-sī-a, s. [Gr. Thespiacos (thespestos) = divine, sacred, from the fact that Thespesia populnea is planted around monasteries and convents, in tropical countries, for the sake of the shade which it affords, and so has come to be regarded with a kind of veneration.]

Bot.: A tribe of Hibiscaceae. Trees with large entire leaves; involucres three-leaved, deciduous; calyx truncate; style simple; stamens five; fruit almost woody; capsule with five cells, each with about four seeds. Thespesia populnea is a tree forty or fifty feet high, with the foliage so dense at the top that it has been called the Umbrella-tree. It has roundish, cordate, pointed, five to seven-veined leaves; the flowers, which are large, are yellow with a dark-red centre. The tree is very common along the sea-coast of South America, the West Indies, the Pacific Islands, part of Africa, India, and Burmah. It has been planted along roadsides throughout India, and especially in Madras city. It yields a gum, a deep-red, somewhat thick oil, used in cutaneous affections. The capsule and flowers furnish a yellow dye, and the bark a good fibre. T. Limpas is a small bush, common in the tropical jungles of India, with a good fibre, as has T. populnea.

Thēs-pī-an, a. & s. [See def.]

A. As adj.: Of or pertaining to Thespis, a Greek dramatic poet, born at Icaria, an Athenian town, at the beginning of the sixth century B.C.; hence, relating to the drama or theatrical representation.

B. As subst.: An actor.

"The Lord Chamberlain . . . clapped the unoffending Thespian in the Gate House."—Doran: Their Majesties Servants (ed. 1664), l. 121.

Thespian-art, s. The drama.

Thēs-sā-ll-an, a. & s. [See def.]

A. As adj.: Of or pertaining to Thessaly; hence, magic, Thessaly in classic times being considered the home of witches. (Hor.: Carm., l. 27, 21; Plin.: H. N., xxx. 1.)

"Spells of such force no wizard gave But framed in dark Thessalian cave."
Scott: Marmion. (Introd.)

B. As subst.: A native or inhabitant of Thessaly.

Thēs-sa-lō-nī-an, a. & s. [See def.]

A. As adj.: Of or pertaining to Thessalonia (now Saloniki), a city in Macedonia.

B. As subst.: A native or inhabitant of Thessalonia.

¶ St. Paul's Epistles to the Thessalonians:

New Testament Canon:

1. The First Epistle of Paul the Apostle to the Thessalonians.—St. Paul, on his second missionary journey, about A.D. 52, leaving Philippi [PHILIPPAN, 1], after his unjust imprisonment there (Acts xvi. 9-40), passed through Amphipolis and Apollonia, and went on to Thessalonica, where, for three successive Sabbaths in the Jewish synagogue, he contended that the Christ, Messiah, or Anointed One, of Old Testament prophecy, was destined to suffer and to rise again, and that Jesus was that Christ. His missionary efforts were probably continued for a considerable time longer outside the synagogue. A multitude of devout Greeks, not a few of the chief women, and others believed. This success, however, infuriated the unbelieving Jews, who broke into riot, drew to them the rougher part of the lower classes, assaulted the house of Jason, and dragged him and other believers before the magistrate, who released them, after taking security for their future conduct. The Christians secretly conveyed Paul from the place by night, the apostle going to Berea, whither the Thessalonian Jews followed him, compelling him again to leave, his new destination being Athens, and thence to Corinth. It is believed the first epistle was sent about the end of A.D. 52, or early in 53, to the Thessalonian Church. In it Paul speaks of their faith, love, patience, and other qualities (ch. i.), and alludes to the persecution which they and he had undergone (l. 6, ii. 1-19). To relieve his natural anxiety regarding their steadfastness in trial, he had sent Timothy to visit them, and had heard from him the most cheering accounts of their state (ch. iii.). He concludes by giving them practical exhortations, one of which is not to sorrow unduly for deceased Christian relatives or friends, but to console themselves by thinking of their resurrection at the second advent of Christ (iv. 1-18-v. 28). The epistle was universally accepted in ancient times, though no undoubted allusions to it exist till towards the close of the second century. Its authenticity has been questioned by Baur.

2. The Second Epistle of Paul the Apostle to the Thessalonians seems to have been written from Corinth shortly after the first, whilst Silvanus and Timothy were still Paul's associates. The Thessalonians had taken up the idea, probably from the words in 1 Thess. iv. 15, 17, "we which are alive and remain," that the second advent of Christ was very near, and some of them had ceased to labour, and gone about as idlers and busybodies. After an introduction (ch. i.), Paul shows that, previous to this consummation, an apostasy would occur, and a personage, the "Man of Sin," "the Son of Perdition," or a principle, "the Mystery of Iniquity," had first to appear and gain dominant power in the "temple" (ch. ii.). Then he counsels the idlers "to work, and eat their own bread," and, after other exhortations, concludes with the benediction (ch. iii.). The evidence for the epistle is similar to that for the earlier one.

thē'-ta, s. [Gr.] A letter (Θ, θ, Σ) of the Greek alphabet corresponding to th in such English words as thin; sometimes called the unlucky letter, as being used by judges in sentencing a prisoner, it being the first letter of the Gr. θάνατος (thanatos) = death.

* thētōch, thatch, s. [VETCH.]

* thētch, v.t. [TRATCH.]

* thēt'-ko-al, a. [Gr. θετικός (thētikos).] [THESIS.] Laid down; absolute or incontrovertible, as a law.

"So that this law that prohibited Adam the eating of the fruit, was mere thetical or positive, not indispensable and natural."—More: Def. Literal Cabbala, ch. ii.

thē'-time, s. [Pref. th(i)o], and Eng. (th(e)time)]

Chem. (Pl.): The name given to a series of sulphur compounds analogous to betaine and its homologues, and represented by the formula, $CH_2-S(CnH_{2n+1})_2$. The methyl and ethyl compounds are the only ones at present known; thus methyl thietine, $C_4H_9S_2O$ = $CH_2-S(CH_3)_2$, obtained by mixing bromacetic acid with methyl sulphide in molecular proportions.

Thēt'-is, s. [Gr.]

1. Greek Mythol.: One of the sea-deities, daughter of Nereus and Doris. She was courted by Peleus, son of Ææus, king of the Myrmidons. Thetis became mother of several children by Peleus; but these she destroyed by fire in attempting to see whether they were immortal; and Achilles, her most distinguished offspring, must have shared the same fate, if Peleus had not snatched him from her hand.

2. Astron.: [ASTEROID, 17].

3. Zool. & Palæont.: A genus of Myacide. Shell sub-orbicular, ventricose, thin, translucent, granulated on the surface, and with a slightly nacreous interior. Hinge with one or two. Known species: recent five from Britain, France, India, &c.; fossil seventeen, from the Neocomian of Britain, Belgium, France, and Southern India onward.

thēt'-seē, s. [THIESTIE.]

* thē-ūr'-gic, "thē-ūr'-gic-al, a. [Lat. theurgicus, from Gr. θεουργικός (theourgikos), from θεός (theos) = god, and εργον (ergon) = work.] Of or pertaining to theurgy, or the power of performing supernatural things.

"All his endeavours to purge his soul by these theurgic consecrations was frustrate."—Bullivert: Metamorphosa, p. 51.

theurgic-hymns, s. pl. Songs of incantation.

* thē-ūr'-gist, s. [Eng. theurgy]; -ist.] One who pretends to or practises theurgy.

"More refined necromancers or magicians call themselves theurgists, . . . thinking to have to do only with good spirits."—Bullivert: Metamorphosa, p. 61.

* thē-ūr'-gū, s. [Lat. theurgia, from Gr. θεουργία (theurgia) = divine work, magic; θεός (theos) = god, and εργον (ergon) = work; Fr. theurgie; Sp. & Ital. teurgia.] The working of some divinis or supernatural agency in human affairs; a working or producing effects by supernatural means; effects or phenomena brought about amongst men by apiritual agency; specifically—

(1) Divine agency or direct interference of the gods in human affairs, or the government of the world.

(2) The art or art of invoking deities or spirits, or by their intervention conjuring up visions, interpreting dreams, receiving or explaining oracles, &c.; the power of obtaining from the gods, by means of certain observances, words, symbols, or the like, a knowledge of the secrets which surpass the power of reason, to lay open the future, &c.

(3) That species of magic which more modern professors of the art allege to produce its effects by supernatural agency, as contradistinguished from natural magic.

"Porphyry and some others did distinguish these two sorts, so as to condemn indeed the grosser, which they called magic or sooty; but allowed the other, which they termed theurgy, as laudable and honourable, and as an art by which they received angels, and had communications with the gods. Yet St. Austin assures us they are both damnable."—Bullivert: Metamorphosa, p. 51.

(4) A system of supernatural knowledge or power believed by the Egyptian Platonists to have been divinely communicated to a hierarchy, and by them handed down from generation to generation.

thē-vē-tī-a (or tī as shī), s. [Named by Linnæus after its describer, Thevet, a French Franciscan, of the sixteenth century.]

Bot.: A genus of Carissee (q.v.). Infloresence consisting of terminal or lateral cymes. Calyx five-parted, with many glands inside at its base; corolla salver-shaped, closed by four scales; fruita slightly fleshy, with a hard stone inside. Thevetia nerifolia is cultivated in tropical America, which it has been introduced into India. The milky juice is very poisonous, the bitter and cathartic bark is a febrifuge, and an oil extracted from the kernels is emetic and purgative. The seeds of T. Ahoval are poisonous, the bark and asp emetic and narcotic. The wood of both has a heavy odour, and is used for poisoning fish.

thē-vē-tō'-sīn, s. [Mod. Lat. thelvetia]; suff. -ose, -in.]

Chem.: A glucoside obtained from the seeds of a species of Thevetia, growing in Mexico. It crystallizes in four-sided prisms, is soluble in alcohol, and when heated with dilute sulphuric acid is resolved into glucose and a resinous body. It is said to be very poisonous, acting as an emetic.

thew (1) (ew as ū), thēaw, s. [A.S. thēaw = habit, custom, behaviour, in pl. manners; cogn. with O.S. thau = custom, habit; O. H. Ger. thou, dan.]

1. Muscle, sinews, strength. (Generally in the plural.)

"Romans now have thēaw and limbs like to their ancestors." Shakespeare: Julius Caesar, l. 2.

*2. Manners, mental qualities, habits, behaviour. (Generally in the plural.)

"To all good thēaw born was she. As like to the goddess, or she was born That of the shefs she should be the corna." Chaucer: Hypermetra.

thēw (2), s. [Theow.]

thewed (ew as ū), thēwde, a. [Eng. threw (1), s.; -ed.]

1. Having thēaw, muscle, or strength; muscular, strong.

*2. Having manners; mannered, accustomed.

"But he was wise, and wary of her will, And ever held his hand upon his hart; Yet would not seeme so rude, and thēwed ill, As to despise so courteous seeming part." Spenser: F. Q., II. vi. 26.

thēw-ŷ (ew as ū), a. [Eng. threw (1); -ŷ.] Muscular, strong, brawny.

thēy, *thal, *thel, pron. [See def.] The plural form for all the genders of the third personal pronoun, i.e., he, she, or it. It superseded the older hi, pl. of hēo, hīe = he, she, it. It is Scandinavian rather than English, being from Icel. thēr (nom.) thā (accus.); A.S. thā (nom.), thāra, thōra (geot.); thām, thēm (dat.); thā (accus.); cf. Dan. & Sw. de = they; dem = them.

*Rhōide ys the lilles of the fēid hōt hē wax, thē travelen not neither spynen." Wycliffe: Matthew.

†It is used indefinitely in the phrase, they say (Fr. on dit), that is, people say, it is said.

thī-a, s. [Lat., from Gr. Θεία (Theia) = a daughter of Earth, mother of the Sun and Moon.]

Zool.: A genus of Oxystomata, with one species, Thia polita, ten lines long. Found on the shores of Britain and the Mediterranean, burrowing in sand a little distance from the shore.

thī-a-çēt'-īo, a. [Pref. thi(o), and Eng. acetic.] Derived from or containing sulphur and acetic acid.

thiacetic acid, s.

Chem.: (CH₃)₂COSH. Sulphurate of acetyl. This acid, discovered by Kekulé, is formed by the action of pentasulphide of phosphorus on glacial acetic acid. It is a colourless liquid, boiling at 93°, smells like acetic acid and hydrogen sulphide, and is slightly soluble in water, but mixes in all proportions with alcohol and ether. With solution of lead acetate it forms a crystalline precipitate = (C₂H₃OS)₂Pb.

thī-ā'-dīne, s. [Pref. thi(o); Eng. ald(ehyic), and suff. -ine.]

Chem.: C₆H₁₃NS₂. Obtained by passing a current of sulphuric acid gas into aldehyde ammonia. In a few hours thialdine crystallizes out. When recrystallized from a solution of ether and alcohol it separates in large rhombic tables, strongly refracting, and having a density of 1.19. It has an aromatic odour, melts at 43°, volatilizes at ordinary temperature, very slightly soluble in water, easily soluble in alcohol and ether. It has no action on vegetable colours, but dissolves in acids, forming soluble and crystallizable salts.

thī-a-mēth-ā'-dīne, s. [Pref. thi(o); Eng. meth(yl), and aldine.]

Chem.: C₆H₁₃(CH₃)NS₂. Formed by saturating aldehyde with methylamine, and then passing sulphuric acid gas into it. It separates as an easily decomposable oil.

thī-ān-i-sō'-īc, a. [Pref. thi(o), and Eng. anisole.] Derived from or containing sulphur and anisole acid.

thianisole acid, s.

Chem.: C₁₀H₁₄O₂SO₂. A monobasic acid containing the elements of anise-camphor and sulphurous acid. Anethol is boiled with nitric acid, and the oil produced distilled. The distillate between 215° and 245° is left in contact with acid sodium sulphate and alcohol, the sodium salt crystallizing out. The acid can be obtained in crystals from its barium salt by the addition of sulphuric acid. It has an astringent taste, is easily soluble in water, alcohol, and ether, and forms crystallizable salts.

thī-ān'-is-ōl, s. [Pref. thi(o), and Eng. anisole.]

Chem.: C₆H₆SO. A white pulverulent substance formed by the action of ammonium sulphide on anisidramide. (Watts.)

thī-bāu'-dī-g (th as t), s. [Named after Thiebaut, secretary to the Linnean Society of Paris.]

Bot.: A genus of Vacciniaceae, chiefly from Peru. Leaves leathery, evergreen; calyx five-toothed; corolla tubulose, with a five-toothed limb; stamens ten, anthers two-horned. Wine is made from the fruit of Thibaudia macrophylla, and an aromatic tincture, used as a remedy for toothache, from T. Quercina.

Thī-bēt' (th as t), s. [See def.] A country in Asia.

Thīb-ēt-an, Thī-bē-tī-an (Th as T, ti as shī), a. [Eng. Thibet; -an, -ian.] Tibetan.

thine, * thin, adj. or pron. [A.S. thīn, poss. pron. declined like an adjective; derived from thīn, genit. case of thū = thou (q.v.). Cogn. with Icel. thinn, thín, thít, from thín, genit. of thú; Dan. & Sw. tinn; Ger. dein, from deiner, genit. of du; Goth. thins, from thian, genit. of thū. In Mid. Eng. thín was declined, genit. thines, dat. thine, nom. and accus. thí; by loss of a name Mid. Eng. thí = Eng. thy. The n was commonly retained before a vowel and when the pronoun followed the substantive.] Thy; belonging to thee; being the property of thee; relating to thee. Like thou, thine is now seldom used except in poetry, solemn discourses, or the language of the Quakers. Thine is the form generally used before a vowel, thy taking its place before consonants; but this use is not strictly adhered to, many writers using both forms before vowels, but thine is always used if it follows the noun. Like hers, ours, yours, mine, his, theirs, thine is used absolutely or independently—that is, without the noun to which it belongs—and serves either as a nominative or objective or predicate: as, Thine are poor, Give me thine, That house is thine.

"Olive every man thine ear but few thy voice." Shakespeare: Hamlet, I. 3.

thing, * thyng, s. [A.S. thing = a cause, sake, office, reason, council; cogn. with Dut. ding; Icel. thing = a thing . . . a meeting; Dan. & Sw. ting; O. H. Ger. dinc; Ger. ding. From the same root as A.S. thion = to thrive [THEE, v.]; thingan = to grow.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Anything which can be made the subject of consideration or discussion; anything separable or distinguishable as an object of thought; anything animate or inanimate; whatever exists, or is conceived to exist, as a separate entity.

"The universality of one name to many things, hath been the cause that men think the things are themselves universal; and so seriously contend, that besides Peter and John, and all the rest of the men that are, have been, or shall be in the world, there is yet something else that we call man, viz., man in general—deceiving themselves by taking the universal, or general appellation, for the thing it signifieth."—Hobbes: Human Nature, ch. v.

2. An inanimate object as distinguished from a living being; any lifeless material or object.

"Ye meads and groves, unconscious things! Ye know not whence my pleasure springs." Cooper: Secrets of Divine Love.

3. Applied to man or animals, often in pity or contempt, sometimes with an idea of fondness, tenderness, or admiration.

4. An act, a deed, a transaction, a matter, an event, an action; anything which happens or falls out, or is done, told, or proposed.

thi-nô, pref. [Gr. θῆς (this), genit. θηρός (thimos) = the beach, the shore.] Inhabiting or found on the shore.

thi-nô-côr-i-dæ, s. pl. [Lat. thinocor(us); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -idæ.]

Ornith.: Quail-anipes; a family of Grallæ, with two genera, Attagis and Thinocorus (q. v.).

thi-nôc-ôr-ûs, s. [Pref. thino-, and Gr. χορεύω (choreuô) = to dance. (Agassiz.)]

Ornith.: The type-genus of Thinocoridae, with two species, from La Plata, Chili, and Peru.

thi-nô-hy-ûs, a. [Pref. thino-, and Gr. ὑς (hus), genit. ῥός (husos) = a swine.]

Paleont.: A genus of Suidæ, abundant in the Upper Miocene of Oregon. It is allied to Dicotyles (q. v.), but has an additional pre-molar tooth and a much smaller brain-cavity.

thi-nô-lës-tês, s. [Pref. thino-, and Gr. ἄστρος (astros) = a robber.]

Paleont.: A genus of Limnotheridæ, from the Lower Eocene of Wyoming.

thi-nô-lite, s. [Pref. thino-, and Gr. λίθος = a stone.]

Min.: A name given to a large shore deposit of tuffaceous carbonate of lime, which contains pseudomorphs of a mineral believed to have originally been gaylussite (q. v.). E. S. Dana has pointed out that the angles of some of the crystals are not found to coincide with those of the latter mineral, and that the original mineral remains still unknown.

thi-ô, pref. [Gr. θειόν (theion) = sulphur.] Having sulphur in its composition.

thio-alcohols, s. pl. [MERCAPTAN.]

thio-ethyl ether, a. [ETHYL-SULPHIDE.]

thio-urea, s. [SULPHUREA.]

thi-ô-hën-sô-îc, a. [Pref. thio-, and Eng. benzoic.] Derived from or containing sulphur and benzoic acid.

Chem.: $\begin{matrix} \text{C}_6\text{H}_5 \\ | \\ \text{COSH} \end{matrix}$. An analogue of thiactic acid. Produced by mixing an alcoholic solution of potassium monosulphide with chloride of benzoyl. Hydrochloric acid added to the potash salt separates the acid as an oily body, which when left for some time deposits the acid in colourless crystals. When pure, it forms small rhombic tables, inodorous and tasteless, melts at 120°, is quite insoluble in water, slightly soluble in alcohol and ether, and easily in carbonic disulphide. It forms definite salts with bases.

thi-ô-hy-tÿr-îc, a. [Pref. thio-, and Eng. butyric.] Derived from or containing sulphur and butyric acid.

Chem.: $\text{C}_4\text{H}_7\text{OS}$. An acid homologous with thiactic acid, produced by the action of phosphoric protosulphide on butyric acid.

thi-ô-câp-rin-âl'-dîne, a. [Pref. thio-; Eng. capric, and aldine.]

Chem.: A compound analogous to thialdine, formed, according to Wagner, by the action of sulphydric acid on the ammonia compound of capric aldehyde. (Watts.)

thi-ô-car-ba-mide, s. [Pref. thio-, and Eng. carbamide.] [SULPHUREA.]

thi-ô-car-ban-îl, s. [Pref. thio-; Eng. carb(on), and anil(ine).]

Chem.: CSNC_6H_5 . Phenyllic mustard oil. Formed from the carbaniil by distillation with phosphoric anhydride, and by the action of phosgene on aniline. A colourless liquid, smelling like mustard oil, and boiling at 222°.

thi-ô-carb-ân-îl-îde, s. [Eng. thiocarbaniil; -ide.]

Chem.: $\text{CS-NH(C}_6\text{H}_5)$. Formed by heating equivalent quantities of aniline and potash hydrate in alcoholic solution with excess of carbon sulphide. Dilute hydrochloric acid is added, and, after evaporation, the mass is crystallized from alcohol. It yields colourless laminae, melting at 144°, insoluble in water, very soluble in alcohol and ether.

thi-ô-chrôn-îc, a. [Pref. thio-; second element doubtful.] Derived from or containing sulphur and chloroquinone.

thiochronic acid, s.

Chem.: $\text{C}_6\text{H}_2\text{S}_4\text{O}_4$. Obtained as a potassium salt when a hot solution of perchloroquinone is mixed with concentrated aqueous acid sulphite of potassium.

thi-ôç-in-nôl, a. [Pref. thio-; Eng. cinna(g), and suff. -ol.]

Chem.: $\text{C}_9\text{H}_8\text{S}$. A pulverulent substance formed, with sulphide of ammonium, by the action of sulphydric acid on hydrocinnaumide, $\text{C}_7\text{H}_7\text{N}_2 + 4\text{H}_2\text{S} = 3\text{C}_9\text{H}_8\text{S} + (\text{NH}_4)_2\text{S}$.

thi-ô-crê-sôl, s. [Pref. thio-, and Eng. eresol.]

Chem. (Pl.): $\text{C}_6\text{H}_4 \begin{matrix} \text{CH}_3 \\ \text{SH} \end{matrix}$. Toly hydrosulphides. Produced from the three isomeric toluene sulphonic acids by reducing the corresponding chlorides with zinc and hydrochloric acid. (1) Ortho-, shining laminae, melting at 15°, boiling at 188°. (2) Meta-, liquid, not solid, at -10°. (3) Para-, large laminae, melting at 48°, boiling at 188°.

thi-ô-cy-ân-îc, a. [Pref. thio-, and Eng. cyanic.] Derived from or containing sulphur and cyanic acid.

thiocyanic acid, s.

Chem.: CHNS . Obtained by decomposing lead thiocyanate in water, with sulphydric acid gas. Its solution is colourless, very acid, and not poisonous. Soluble thiocyanates give a blood-red colour with ferric salts, thus affording a delicate test for hydrocyanic acid, if the latter be first converted into thiocyanate by yellow ammonium sulphide.

Chem. (Pl.): Normal ethyl thiocyanate, $\begin{matrix} \text{N} \\ | \\ \text{C} \\ | \\ \text{S}(\text{C}_2\text{H}_5) \end{matrix}$ is a mobile, colourless, strongly refracting liquid, with an odour like that of mercaptan. Boils at 146°. Ethyl isothiocyanate = $\begin{matrix} \text{N} \\ | \\ \text{C} \\ | \\ \text{S} \end{matrix} \text{C}_2\text{H}_5$. Differs in all properties from the normal compound.

It boils at 134°, has the irritating odour of mustard-oil, and unites directly with ammonia. These ethers exhibit isomerism like those of the alcohol cyanates and isocyanates, as clearly shown in the case of the ethyl compounds.

thi-ô-dî-a-çêt-îc, a. [Pref. thio-; dî, and Eng. acetic.] [THIODIOLYCOLLIC.]

thi-ô-dî-gly-ôil-la-mide, s. [Pref. thio-; dî, and Eng. glycollamide.]

Chem.: $\begin{matrix} \text{C}_2\text{H}_5 \\ \text{C}_2\text{H}_5\text{O} \end{matrix} \text{N}(\text{NH}_2)_2\text{S}$. Obtained by the action of sulphide of ammonium on chloracetamide in alcoholic solution. Recrystallized from water it forms small white octahedrons, which melt when heated.

thi-ô-dî-gly-ôil-îc, a. [Pref. thio-; dî, and Eng. glycollic.] Derived from or pertaining to sulphur and glycollic acid.

Chem.: $\begin{matrix} \text{C}_2\text{H}_5\text{O} \\ \text{C}_2\text{H}_5\text{O} \end{matrix} \text{S}(\text{HO})_2$. Formed by boiling thiodiglycollamide with baryta-water as long as ammonia is evolved. By decomposing the lead salt and evaporating the filtrate the acid is obtained in crystals.

thi-ô-dî-gly-ôil-îm-îde, a. [Pref. thio-; dî; Eng. glycol, and imide.]

Chem.: $\begin{matrix} \text{C}_2\text{H}_5 \\ \text{C}_2\text{H}_5\text{O} \end{matrix} \text{NHS}$. Formed by the dehydration of acid thiodiglycollate of ammonia, and deposited in thin prismatic needles or laminae from a hot aqueous solution. It is sparingly soluble in cold water, melts at 128°, and sublimes at a higher temperature.

thi-ô-for-mîc, a. [Pref. thio-, and Eng. formic.] Derived from or containing sulphur and formic acid.

thioformic acid, s.

Chem.: A compound formed in small quantity by the action of sulphydric acid on formate of lead. It yields small transparent crystals, having an alliaceous odour, is insoluble in water, and melts at 120°.

thi-ô-fû-cûs-ôl, s. [Pref. thio-, and Eng. fucosol.]

Chem.: A substance produced by treating fucosol in alcoholic solution with sulphydric acid.

tâte, fât, fâre, amidst, whât, fâll, father; wê, wêt, hère, camêl, hêr, thêre; pine, pît, sîre, sîr, marine; gô, pô, or, wore, wôlf, wôrk, whô, sôn; mûte, cûb, cûre, unîte, ôur, râle, fûll; trÿ, Sÿrian. æ, œ = ô; øy = â; qn = kw.

thi-ô-für-föl, s. [THIOFURFOL.]

Chem.: C_2H_4OS . Thiofurfuröl. A white crystalline powder, formed by the action of ammonium sulphide on furfural, or of sulphuric acid on furfuralamide.

thi-ô-für-fy-röl, s. [THIOFURFOL.]

Chem.: C_2H_4OS . Thiofurfuröl. A white crystalline powder, formed by the action of ammonium sulphide on furfural, or of sulphuric acid on furfuralamide.

thi-ô-f-sa-tyde, s. [THIOFURFOL.]

Chem.: C_2H_4OS . Thiofurfuröl. A white crystalline powder, formed by the action of ammonium sulphide on furfural, or of sulphuric acid on furfuralamide.

thi-ô-mé-lán-ýc, a. [THIO- and Eng. melanic.]

Derived from or containing sulphur and melanic acid.

thiomelanic-acid, s.

Chem.: A sulphuretted acid, found in the black mass produced by heating alcohol with excess of sulphuric acid. It is capable of forming salts with potash and other bases.

thi-ôn-, pref. [THIO-]thi-ô-nám-ýc, a. [THIO- and Eng. amic.]

Derived from or containing sulphurous acid and ammonia.

thionamic-acid, s.

Chem.: NH_2SO_2 . Produced by the action of dry ammonia gas on sulphurous anhydride. It is a crystalline volatile substance, very soluble in water, in which it quickly undergoes complete decomposition.

thi-ôn-a-mide, s. [THIO- and Eng. amide.]

Chem.: $N_2H_4(SO)$. Produced by the action of sulphurous chloride on dry ammonia. It is a white pulverulent, non-crystalline solid.

thi-ô-nür-ýc, a. [THIO- and Eng. uric.]

Derived from or containing sulphurous and uric acids.

thionuric-acid, s.

Chem.: $C_4H_5N_3SO_6$. Formed by the action of sulphurous acid and ammonia on uric acid or alloxan. On evaporating its solution, it yields a crystalline mass consisting of fine needles; is permanent in the air, has a very sour taste, and is very soluble in water. It is dibasic, and forms acid and neutral crystalline salts with bases.

thi-ôn-ýl, s. [Gr. θειον (theion) = sulphur; -ýl.]

Chem.: SO. The radical of the sulphurous compounds.

thi-ôn-ýl-ám-ýc, a. [Eng. thionyl, and amic.] [THIONAMIC.]thi-ôn-ýl-a-mide, s. [Eng. thionyl, and amide.] [THIONAMIDE.]thi-ô-phé-nól, s. [THIO- and Eng. phenol.]

Chem.: C_6H_5SH . Formed by the action of pentasulphide of phosphorus on phenol. It is a colourless, mobile, fetid liquid, boiling at 168°, is insoluble in water, but dissolves easily in alcohol and ether.

thi-ô-phós-phám-ýc, a. [THIO- and Eng. phosphamic.]

Derived from or pertaining to sulphur and phosphamic acid.

thiophosphamic-acid, s.

Chem.: $P(NH_2)_2SO_2$. Produced by the action of sulphochloride of phosphorus on aqueous ammonia. It has not been isolated, but forms a series of salts with bases, nearly all of which are uncrystallizable.

thi-ô-phós-phé-di-ám-ýc, a. [THIO-; Eng. phosphodiamide, and suff. -ýc.]

Derived from or pertaining to sulphur and phosphodiamic acid.

thiophosphodiamic-acid, s.

Chem.: $P(H_2N)_2HSO$. Formed by the action of ammonia gas on sulphochloride of phosphorus. It is obtained as a white mass, easily soluble in water, is monobasic, and forms a series of salts with bases.

thi-or-sau-ite (au as ow), s. [After Thiorsa, Iceland, where found; u connect, and suff. -ite (Min.).]

Min.: The same as ANORTHITE (q.v.).

thi-ô-sín-a-mine, s. [Pref. thio-, and Eng. stramine.]

Chem.: $C_4H_5NS.NH_3$. Formed by the union of mustard oil with ammonia. It is obtained in colourless, prismatic crystals, having a bitter taste, is soluble in water, alcohol, and ether, melts when heated, but cannot be sublimed.

thi-ô-sín-án-íl-ine, s. [Eng. thiosin(amine), and aniline.]

Chem.: $N_2(CS(C_6H_5)(C_6H_5)_2)$. Obtained by pouring oil of mustard into an equivalent of aniline dissolved in alcohol. It separates in foliated, colourless crystals, destitute of taste and smell, insoluble in water, very soluble in alcohol and ether, and shows but little tendency to combine with acids. Melts at 95°.

thi-ô-sül-phür-ýc, a. [THIO- and Eng. sulphuric.]

Derived from or containing sulphur and sulphuric acid.

thiosulphuric-acid, s. [HYPOSULPHUROUS-ACID.]thi-ô-va-lér-ýc, a. [THIO- and Eng. valeric.]

Derived from or containing sulphur and valeric acid.

thiovaleric-acid, s.

Chem.: The product of the action of phosphoric pentachloride on valeric acid.

thir, a. [Icel.] These. (Scotch.)

"Thir breeks o' mine, my only pair,
That ance were plash o' guid blue hair."
Burns: Tam O'Shanter.

third, * thirde, * thrid, * thridde, * thyr, a. & s. [Properly thrid, from A.S. thrida, from threo, thri = three (q.v.); cogn. with Dut. derde; Icel. thridhi; Dan. trede; Sw. trede; Ger. dritte; Goth. thridja; Wel. tryde, trydded; Gael. & Ir. trian; Russ. tretit; Lith. trečias; Lat. tertius; Gr. tritos (tritós); Sans. tritija. For the metathesis of r and t see Binn.]A. As adjectives:

1. The ordinal of three; coming next after the second; coming after two of the same class.

"He was wounded the third tyme."
Robert de Brunne, p. 8.

2. Constituting or being one of three equal parts into which a whole is or may be divided.

"The third part of a minute."
Shakesp.: Midsummer Night's Dream, II. 2.

B. As substantive:I. Ordinary Language:

1. The third part of anything; one of three equal parts.

"2. The sixtieth part of a second."
"Divide the natural day into twenty-four equal parts, an hour into sixty minutes, a minute into sixty seconds, a second into sixty thirds."
Holder: On Time.

II. Technically:

1. Law (Pl.): The third part of the estate of a deceased husband, which, by the law of some countries, the widow is entitled to enjoy during her life; corresponding to the terce of Scots Law.

2. Music:

(1) An interval consisting of a major tone and a minor tone, as from c to e: called a major third.

(2) An interval consisting of a major or minor tone and a semitone, as from a to c: called a minor third.

(3) The upper of the two notes including such intervals.

Third Estate, s.

I. In Great Britain the Commonalty or Commons, represented in the legislature by the House of Commons.

2. French Hist.: The Tiers État (q.v.).

Third-order, s.

Eccles. & Church Hist.: A term which arose from the fact that when St. Francis had founded the Friars Minor (1209) for men, and St. Clare had founded the Poor Clares (1221) for women under a rule presented by him, he established a congregation called the Brothers and Sisters of Penance as a sort of middle term between the world and the cloister, with a separate rule, the members of which, men and women, married or single, "should be bound by rule to dress more soberly, fast more strictly, pray more regularly, hear mass more frequently, and practise works of mercy more systematically than ordinary persons living in the world." They had to undergo a year's novitiate and to take a simple vow to observe the rule. Many of these persons, in course of time, wished to live in community, and so congregations of the Third Order arose—true Franciscans with a rule of their own, distinct from that of the Friars Minors and that of the Poor Clares. Pope Benedict XIII., in the Bull Paterna sedis, speaks of the Third Order "as a true and proper order, uniting in one seculars scattered all over the world and regulars living in community; distinguished from all confraternities as having its own rule, approved by the Holy See, novitiate, profession, and a habit of determinate form and material" (in the case of persons living in the world consisting of a brown ascular worn under the ordinary dress). The Dominicans have a Third Order, instituted by St. Dominic (1170-1221), but in what year is uncertain; the Augustinians established one at the beginning of the fifteenth, and Minims at the beginning of the sixteenth century, and their example has been followed by the Servites, the Carmelites, and the Trappists.

 third-penny, s.

Old Law: A third part of the profits of fines and penalties imposed at the county court, which was the perquisite of the earl.

third-person, s.

Gram.: The person spoken of.

third-point, s. [TIERCE-POINT.]

Music: A name given to the stave upon which pedal music is written for the organ.

 third, s. [THREAD.]

third-bör-öugh (gh silent), s. [Eng. third, and borough.] An under-constable.

"I know my remedy; I must go fetch the third-borough."
Shakesp.: Taming of the Shrew, I. 1.

 third-íngg, s. pl. [THIRD, a.]

Eng. Law: The third part of the corn or grain growing on the ground at the tenant's death, due to the lord for a heriot, as in the Manor of Turfat, in Herefordshire.

third-ý, adv. [Eng. third, a.; -ý.] In the third place.

"First, metals are more durable than plants; secondly, they are more solid; thirdly, they are wholly subterranean."
Bacon.

third-räte, a. [Eng. third, s., and rate.]

I. Of a very inferior class; very poor: as, a third-rate actor.

2. In the navy applied to a certain class of men-of-war. (Used also substantively.)

thirds, s. pl. [THIRD, a., B. II. 1.]

* thirds'-man, s. [Eng. third and man.] An umpire, a mediator or arbitrator.

"There should be somebody to come in thirds between Death and my principal."
Scott: St. Roman's Well.

thiri (1), * thirle, * thyril-yn, v. l. [A.S. thyrilan, from thyril = a hole.]

I. To bore through, to pierce, to perforate, to penetrate.

"If any thirle or make an hole in a feble wall."
Gesta Romanorum, p. 10.

2. To thrill, to vibrate.

"It thirld the heart-strings thro' the breast."
Journ.: Letter to J. Laprath.

thiri (2), v. l. [Icel. thrall = a thrall, a serf.] [THRAILL.]

To enslave, to enthrall; to restrict or bind by the terms of a lease or otherwise; as, lands thirled to a particular mill. (Scotch.) [THIRLAGE.]

thiri, s. [THIRL (2), v.]

Scots Law: A term used to denote those lands the tenants of which were bound to bring all their grain to a certain mill. Called also Sucken.

 thiri'-a-ble, * thirle-a-nylle, a. [Eng. thiri (1), v.; -able.] Capable of being penetrated or pierced; penetrable.thiri'-age (age as íg), s. [Eng. thiri (2), v.; -age.]

Scots Law: A species of servitude, formerly very common in Scotland, and also prevalent böll, böy; pöüt, jöwl; cat, çell, chorus, çhin, bench; go, gem; thin, þis; sin, aþ; expect, Xenophon, exist. ph = f. -cian, -tian = çhan. -tion, -sion = shün; -þion, -çion = zhün. -cions, -tious, -sious = shüs. -ble, -dle, &c. = bel, del.

in England, by which the proprietors and other possessors of lands were bound to carry the grain produced on the lands to a particular mill to be ground, to which mill the lands were said to be thirled or astrioted, and also to pay a certain proportion of the grain, varying in different cases, as a remuneration for the grinding, and for the expense of the erection and maintenance of the mill. The principal duty chargeable in thirling was malture (q.v.). There were also smaller duties called sequele, which fell to the servants of the mill, according to the particular usage of each mill.

thirl'-ing, s. [THIRL (1), v.]

Mining: A worked space connecting the rooms of a mine. The rooms are galleries proceeding regularly (in coal mines) from the dip-level or main-level, and the unworked space forms a wall. By cutting gaps in this wall at regular intervals, the wall becomes a row of pillars, the said connecting workings are thirlings.

thirst, * thurst, * thurste, * threst, * thrist, * thrusta, s. [A.S. thurst, thyrst, thirst; cogn. with Dut. dorst; Icel. thorst; Dan. tirst; Sw. tirst; Ger. durst; Goth. thaurst.] [THIRST, v.]

L. Lit.: A term used to denote the sensations arising from the want of fluid nutriment; the desire, uneasiness, or suffering arising from want of drink; great desire for drink.

"Though we cool our thirst at the mouth of the river."—Bp. Taylor: On Ser. Forms of Liturgy, § 29.

As perspiration and other discharges carry off moisture from the body, the sensation of thirst arises, and is generally proportionate to the necessity for a fresh supply of liquid. Of all beverages the only part which is essentially required to slake thirst is the water which they contain. Abnormal thirst exists in many diseases; insatiable thirst (Polydipsia) is a symptom of Diureals.

II. Figuratively:

1. Dryness, drought.

"The rapid current . . . through veins Of porous earth with kindly thirst updrawn. Rose a fresh fountain."—Milton: P. L., iv, 228.

2. A want and eager longing or desire after anything. (Now followed by for or after, formerly by of.)

"[Thou] hast allayed The thirst I had of knowledge."—Milton: P. L., vii, 8.

thirst, * thirste, * thurste, * thrust, * thrist, v. i. & t. [A.S. thyrstan; cogn. with Dut. dorsten; Icel. thyrsta; Dan. tirste; Sw. tirsta; Ger. dürsten; Goth. thairstan (pa. t. thars) = to be dry, to thirst; Sansc. tarsha = to thirst; Irish = to thirst; Ir. tart = thirst, drought; Gr. τερομα (tersomai) = to become dry; Lat. torreo = to parch; terra (for tersa) = dry ground. From the same root come terrace, torrid, test, toast, tureen.]

A. Intransitive:

1. Lit.: To feel thirst; to experience a painful sensation for want of drink; to have desire to drink; to be thirsty.

"The people thirsted there for water."—Exodus xvii, 3.

2. Fig.: To have a vehement desire or longing for anything.

"And cruel and blood-thirsty men Would thirst for blood no more."—Cooper: Irony Hymns, xxxiii.

 B. Trans.: To have a thirst for; to desire to drink.

"He seeks his keeper's flesh, and thirsts his blood."—Prior: Solomon, l. 208.

 thirst'-er, s. [Eng. thirst, v.; -er.] One who thirsts.

thirst'-i-ly, adv. [Eng. thirsty; -ly.] In a thirsty manner.

"They heare hungrily and thirstily, but it is but to catch advantages."—Bp. Hall: The Hypocrite.

thirst'-i-ness, s. [Eng. thirsty; -ness.] The quality or state of being thirsty; thirst; vehement desire or longing for anything.

"They who be athirst in the night, if they sleep upon it, lose their thirstiness, although they drink never a drop."—P. Holland: Plutarch, p. 599.

 thirst'-less, a. [Eng. thirsty; -less.] Not having thirst; not having vehement desire for anything.

thirst'-y, * thirst'-ie, a. [A.S. thyrstig; cogn. with Dut. dorstig; Icel. thyrstigr; Dan. & Sw. tirstig; O. H. Ger. durstac, dursteg; Ger. durstig.]

L. Lit.: Feeling a sensation of pain or uneasiness for want of drink; suffering for want of drink; having thirst; suffering from thirst.

"Eager to drink, down rush the thirsty crowd. Hang o'er the banks, and trouble all the flood."—Rosce: Lucon: Pharsalia, lv.

II. Figuratively:

1. Dry; lacking in moisture; parched.

"The thirsty land [shall become] springs of water."—Isaiah xxxv, 7.

2. Having a vehement desire or longing for anything.

"To be thirsty after tottering honour."—Shaksp.: Pericles, iii, 2.

thir'-teen, * thret-tene, a. & s. [A.S. threotene, threotyne, from théo = three, and tén, tyn = ten; cogn. with Dut. dertien; Icel. threttán; Dan. tretten; Sw. tretton; Ger. dreizehn.]

A. As adj.: Ten and three.

"Speaking at the one end, I heard it return the voice thirteen times."—Bacon: Nat. Hist.

B. As substantive:

1. The number which consists of three and ten.

2. A symbol representing thirteen units, as 13 or xiii.

thir'-teenth, a. & s. [A.S. threotédtha; Icel. thiittandi.]

A. As adjective:

1. The ordinal of thirteen; the third after the tenth.

"If she could prove a thirteenth task for him Who twelve achiev'd, the work would be easem."—Beaumont: Psyche.

2. Constituting or being one of thirteen equal parts into which a whole is or may be divided.

B. As substantive:

I. Ord. Lang.: One of thirteen equal parts into which a whole is or may be divided.

II. Music: An interval forming the octave of the sixth, or sixth of the octave.

¶ Chord of the thirteenth: A chord called by some a suspension; by others a secondary seventh. It consists generally of the third, seventh, and thirteenth of the dominant, and is used both in the major and minor modes.

thir'-ty-eth, a. & s. [A.S. thritigóðha.]

A. As adjective:

1. The tenth three told; the next in order after the twenty-ninth; the ordinal of thirty.

2. Constituting or being one of thirty equal parts into which a whole is or may be divided.

B. As subst.: One of thirty equal parts into which a whole is or may be divided.

thir'-ty, * thret-ty, * thrit-ti, * thrit-ty, a. & s. [A.S. thritig, thritig, from thri, thred = three, and suff. -tig = ten; cogn. with Dut. dertig; Icel. thriátíu; Dan. trediv; Sw. trettio; Ger. dreißig.]

A. As adj.: Thrice ten; ten three times repeated; twenty and ten.

"Kings Egebrt, adde ybe kyng thre and thritty yer. Thet foie of Dezenarich hyder com, as ty a side y-do er."—Robert of Gloucester, p. 259.

B. As substantive:

1. The number which consists of three times ten.

2. A symbol which represents thirty units, as xxx. or 30.

¶ The Thirty Tyrants: The thirty magistrates appointed by Sparta over Athens at the termination of the Peloponnesian war. They were overthrown in B.C. 403 after only one year's reign.

thirty-nine articles. [ARTICLE, B. IV.]

thirty-two, s.

Print.: A sheet of paper which folds up into thirty-two leaves or sixty-four pages. Usually written 32mo.

Thirty-years' war, s.

Hist.: The name given to a European war, or rather a succession of wars, which lasted for thirty years (1618-1648), and in which Austria, most of the Catholic princes of Germany, and Spain were engaged on one side throughout, but against different antagonists. The contest was virtually a renewal of the struggles which took place in the days of Charles V.—Protestantism asserting itself, and Papacy determined if possible to keep it down. France took an active part on the Protestant side; for, though Richelieu oppressed the Protestants in France, he helped those of Germany in order to weaken that Power, and so injure a dangerous rival. There were three distinct periods in the struggle. In the first Austria, under Wallenstein, was completely victorious, and threatened to subdue all Germany. In the second the Protestants, under Gustavus Adolphus, carried all before them; and in the third victory was more uncertain and more equally divided. Peace was established by the Treaty of Westphalia (1648), which guaranteed religious liberty to both Lutherans and Calvinists, and made extensive territorial changes at the expense of Austria and Germany. France obtained Alsace (which became German again in 1871), and the State of Brandenburg, received still larger additions; these were in 1701 merged in the new kingdom of Prussia, afterwards the nucleus of the German Empire (1871).

this, thes, a. or pron. [A.S. ðes (masc.), ðeós (fem.), ðis (neut.); cogn. with Dut. dees; Icel. ðessi (masc. & fem.), ðetta (neut.); O. H. Ger. deser; M. H. Ger. dir; Ger. dieser. The modern plural form is these, those being used as the pl. of that, but both forms are really plurals of this, the Mid. Eng. word for those being tho or thoo, from A.S. ðá, nom. pl. of the def. article. This is formed of the two pronominal bases, tha (seen in that, thither, &c.) and sa = he.]

1. Used to denote something that is present or near in place or time, or that has been just mentioned.

"And wanne the tilerts elghen him: thel thoughten withime hemself and seiden, this is the air, as we him that the eritage be oure."—Wycliffe: Luke xx.

2. This is frequently used as a substitute for what has preceded: as—

"When they heard this, they were pricked in their heart."—Acts ii, 37.

Where this refers to the words of Peter just spoken. It also frequently represents a word, a sentence, or a clause, and in some cases it refers to something to be immediately said or done.

"But know this, that if the Goodman of the house had known in what watch the thief would come, he would have watched and would not have suffered his house to be broken up."—Matthew xxiv, 43.

3. This is used absolutely to denote present place, state, condition, or the like.

"O Antony, I have followed thee to this."—Shaksp.: Antony & Cleopatra, v, l.

4. Used in reference to time, this may refer to:

(1) The present time; as, this day, this week. It is also frequently used in this sense absolutely, as the present time, hour, &c.

"Between this and supper."—Shaksp.: Coriolanus, iv, 4.

(2) Time past; the time immediately before the present.

"Whereof this month I have been hammering."—Shaksp.: Two Gentlemen, l, 4.

(3) Time to come; futurity.

"This night I'll waste in sorrow."—Shaksp.: Venus & Adonis, 388.

¶ (1) This is often used in connection with numbers instead of the plural these, the sum being considered, as it were, a total.

"Which for this thirteen years we have let slip."—Shaksp.: Measure for Measure, l, 1.

(2) Shakespeare used the phrases this day, this night, in the sense of last even, last night.

"My troublous dream this night doth make me sad."—Shaksp.: 2 Henry VI., l, 1.

5. This, when used as opposed or correlative to that, refers properly to the nearest person or object, that referring to the more distant. But the two words are frequently used to denote reference indefinitely:

"Two ships, Of Corinth that, of Epidaurus this."—Shaksp.: Comedy of Errors, l, 1.

When used in reference to things spoken of, this refers to that last mentioned; that to a thing previously mentioned—

"Their judgment in this we may not, and in that we need not follow."—Hooker.

Sometimes it is used in opposition to other:

"Consider the arguments which the author had to write this, or to design the other before you arraign him."—Dryden.

¶ (1) This is sometimes found as a contraction for this is.

"This a good friar, belike."—Shaksp.: Measure for Measure, v, l.

(2) It is used, not to define or point to something, but to designate things or persons as sufficiently known in their qualities, some times in a good, often in a bad sense.

"Where is this Hector?"—Shaksp.: Troilus & Cressida, v, 5.

fâte, fât, fâre, amidst, whât, fâll, father; wê, wêt, hère, camel, hêr, thêre; pine, pît, sire, sir, marine; gô, pô, or, wêre, wôlf, wôrk, whô, sôn; mâte, cûb, cûre, ûnite, cûr, rûle, fûll; trÿ, Sÿrian. æ, œ = ô; ey = â; qn = kw.

(3) By this: By or before this time: as, By this the man was gone.

(4) Used for thus or so:

"What am I that thou shouldst condemn me this?" Shakespeare: Venus & Adonis, 208.

*this-ness, s. [Eng. this; -ness.] The state or quality of being this; hecceity. [THEAT-NESS.]

"It is evident that sameness, thisness, and thatness belongeth not to matter by itself."—Sir K. Inghy: Observ. on Religio Medici.

this-tle (tle as el), *this-til, *thys-tylle, s. [A.S. thistel; cogn. with Dut. distel; Icel. thistill; Dan. tisdæl; Sw. tistel; O. H. Ger. distil, distula; Ger. distel.]

1. Ord. Lang.: A name given to many plants with prickly stems, leaves, and involucre, or having at least one of these parts prickly. Most are compositae of the tribe Cynareæ. Among these are the Spear thistle, Carduus lanceolatus, the emblem of Scotland; the Blessed thistle, Carduus benedictus; the Cardine thistle, and many others. Britten & Holland enumerate forty-six species having thistle as the last word of their compound name. Some other plants are called thistles; thus the Mexican thistle, Argemone mexicana, is a poppy with prickly leaves. [RUSSIAN-THISTLE.]

2. Bot.: (1) The genus Carduus (q.v.). [CAR-LINA, ONOPORDON.]

Order of the Thistle: A Scottish order of knighthood, sometimes called the Order of St. Andrew. It was instituted by James II. of England, in 1687, when eight knights, in obedience during the reign of William and Mary, and was revived by Queen Anne in 1703. As at present constituted, the Order consists of sixteen knights. The insignia consist of a collar, badge, jewel, star, and ribbon. The collar is composed of golden thistles and leaves connected by crossed sprigs of rue, enamelled. The badge is a golden eight-pointed star, whereon is an enamelled figure of St. Andrew, bearing in front of him his cross in silver; it is worn attached to the collar. The jewel is worn round the neck with the ribbon. The star is of four points, with a St. Andrew's Cross embroidered in silver upon it. In the centre is a green and gold thistle within a circle of green, bearing the motto in golden letters. Ribbon, dark-green. Motto: Nemo me impune lacessit. Beside the knights ordinary, there are extra knights (princes), and a dean, a secretary, the lion-king-at-arms, and the gentleman usher of the green rod.

thisle-crown, s. A gold coin of James VI. of Scotland (James I. of England), of the value of 4s. It bore on the obverse a rose, and on the reverse a thistle, both crowned.

thisle-digger, s. A long narrow spade for cutting the roots of thistles below the crown of the root, and lifting them from the ground.

thisle-down, s. The down or winged seeds of the thistle.

"As a snow-flake falls on snow-flake, As a leaf drops on a river, As the thisle-down on water." Longfellow: Hiawatha, xii.

thisle-finch, s. The goldfinch (q.v.).

thisle-hemp, s.

Bot.: Cannabis sativa. (Britten & Holland.)

*thisle-warp, s. A bird, asposed to be the goldfinch.

this-ly (st as s), a. [Eng. thistly(-); -y.]

1. Literally:

I. Overgrown or abounding with thistles.

"While the quail clamours for his running mate, Wids o'er the thistly lawn, as swells the breeze." Thomson: Summer, 1, 658.

2. Resembling a thistle; prickly.

*II. Fig.: Sharp, pricking, pricking.

"In such a world, so thorny, and where none find happiness unobscured, or, if found, Without some thistly sorrow at its side." Cowper: Task, iv. 888.

this-er, *thed-er, *thid-er, *thyd-er, *thid-ir, adv. [A.S. thider, thyder; cogn. with Icel. thadra = there; Goth. thairo = thence; Sansc. tatra = there, thither.]

1. To that place; opposed to hither.

"And thither came John of Thirstaine, And thither came William of Deloraine." Scott: Lay of the Last Minstrel, ii. 83.

"The place of thither has been largely taken in ordinary language by there.

*2. To that end; to that point.

"Hither and thither: To this place and to that; one way and another: as, To run hither and thither in perplexity.

*thith-er-tò, adv. [Eng. thither, and to.] To that point; so far.

this-er-ward, *thid-er-ward, *thid-er-warde, *thydreward, adv. [A.S. thiderward.] Toward that place; in that direction.

"Through bright are the waters of Sing-s-hay, And the golden floods that thitheread stray." Moore: Paradise & the Peri.

this-see, s. [THEETSEE.]

this-i-än-tha, s. [Gr. θαλασσις (thalassias) = a eunuch, and άνθος (anthos) = bloom.]

Bot.: A genus of Cucurbitaceæ. Thladiantha dubia is a pubescent Indian climber with oblong, succulent, twelve-ribbed fruit, which is eaten by natives of the Himalaya mountains.

this-pi, s. [Lat., from Gr. θάσπι (thaspis) = a crucifer, perhaps shepherd's purse.]

Bot.: Penny-cress, the typical genus of Thlaspiæ (q.v.). Herbs with rosulate radical and hastate cauline leaves; pod short, laterally compressed, valves winged at the back; cells two to eight seeded. Thlaspi arvense, the Penny-cress, is found in stony cultivated fields in Canada and the Northern States; also in Europe. It has a disagreeable garlic odor. Th. tuberosum, of Pennsylvania, has a rather large rose-colored flower. [PENNY-CRESS.]

this-pid-è-ø, this-pí-dø, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. thasp(i); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -idæ.]

Bot.: A family of Pleurorhizææ. Pouch compressed, with the dissepiments very narrow in the narrowest diameter; valves keeled or winged.

this-pis, s. [Gr. = pressure, compression, from Gr. θάσσω (thássō) = to press.]

Med.: Compression; especially, constriction of vessels by an external cause; oppression.

this-sür-ø, s. [Gr. θάψις (thápsis) = pressure, and ούρα (oura) = the tail.]

Zool.: A genus of Cytheridæ. Three species from the Upper Silurian.

*thò, adv. [A. S. thá.] Then.

"Tho wrapping up her wreathed stern around Lept Serce upon his shield." Spenser: F. Q. l. i. 13.

thò, conj. [See def.] A contraction of though (q.v.).

*thò-an, a. [Mod. Lat. th(ou); -an.] Of, belonging to, or resembling the section Thous (q.v.).

"The Thous group represents in form the wolf on a reduced scale."—Naturist's Library, iv. 193.

thof, conj. [See def.] A provincial form of though, the old guttural being changed to f, as in rough.

thóle (1), thowl, thowel, *thol, *tol, *tholle, s. [A. S. thol; cogn. with Dut. dol; Icel. thollr = a tree, a thole; Dan. tol = a stopple, a stopper, a thole; Sw. tall = a pine-tree. Probably connected with thill (q.v.).]

*1. A cart-pin. (Palgrave.)

*2. Husband.: The nib, pin, or handle of a scythe-noath.

*3. Naut.: A pin inserted in the gunwale of a boat to serve as a fulcrum for the oar in rowing. They are arranged in pairs, the space between forming one kind of rowlock. Tholes are shown on the gunwales of ancient Assyrian boats.

"The sound of their oars on the tholes had died in the distance." Longfellow: Evangeline, li. 2.

thole-pin, s. The same as THOLE (3).

thóle (2), s. [Lat. tholus, from Gr. θόλος (tholos) = a dome.]

Architecture:

1. The same as TROULS (q.v.).

2. The scutcheon or knot at the centre of a timber-vault.

3. A place in temples where votive offerings were suspended.

"Let altars smoke and tholes expect our spoils." Pausanias: Greece.

thóle, *thol-en, *tho-li-en, v.t. & i. [A. S. tholian = to endure, to suffer; cogn. with Icel. thola; Dan. taale; Sw. tåla; M. H. Ger. dolen, dahn; O. H. Ger. dolên, tholon; Goth. thulan; M. H. Ger. duld; Ger. geduld = patience. From the same root as Lat. tollo = to raise, tolero = to tolerate.]

A. Trans.: To suffer, to endure, to bear, to undergo.

"A wel vayr companye al so there com Of holy men, that wile tholede martyrdom, Vppe wayr wyte sledes, & in wayr arnare also." Robert of Gloucester, p. 407.

B. Intrans.: To wait. (Scottch.)

thò-lé-ite, s. [After Tholus, where found; suff. -ite (Petrol.).]

Petrol.: A name given by Steinger to a rock which he took for a compound of albite and apatene. A subsequent analysis showed that it was but a dolerite (q.v.).

† thól-ich-thýs, s. [Gr. θόλος (tholos) = a dome, and ιχθύς (ichthys) = a fish.]

Ichthy.: A pseudo-genus of Teleostean Fishes, founded on what are probably immature individuals of the Cyttide, Squamipennes, &c.

tholichthys-stage, s.

Ichthy.: A stage in the development of certain Teleostean Fishes, in which the young differ so widely from the adult as, in many cases, to have been taken for types of distinct genera.

"In the Tholichthys-stage of Pomacanthus the frontal bone is prolonged into a straight insect-shaped process, nearly half as long as the body; the suprascapular and preopercular processes cover and hide the dorsal and ventral fins. The plates attached to the shoulder girdle remain persistent until the young fish has assumed the form of the adult."—Günther: Study of Fishes, pp. 172, 173.

thól-ò-bâte, s. [Gr. θόλος (tholos) = a dome, and βάσις (basis) = a base.]

Arch.: A cupola and a base; that part of a building on which a cupola is placed.

thò-lús, s. [Lat., from Gr. θόλος (tholos) = a dome.]

Arch.: An appellation given to buildings of a circular form. Vitruvius uses it to signify the roof of a circular building. Now frequently applied to the lantern which surmounts a dome. Specifically applied at Athens to the round chamber or Rotunda, in which the Prytanes dined.

thò-mā-ite (th as t), s. [After Prof. Thomaas, of Wiesbaden; suff. -ite (Mtn.).]

Min.: A doubtful species, said to be a carbonate of iron, occurring in pyramidal crystals of the orthorhombic system. Found at Bleisbach in the Siebengebirge.

òil, bøy; pòut, jòwl; cat, çell, chorus, çhin, bench; go, gem; thin, this; sin, as; expect, Xenophon, exist. -ing. -ian, -tian = shan. -tion, -sion = shün; -tion, -sion = zhün. -cious, -tious, -cious = shüs. -ble, -dle, &c. = bøl, døl.

Thóm'-as-íte (Th as T), s. [From John Thomas, M.D., born in London, 1805, died at Worcester, Mass., 1871.]

Church Hist.: A controversial name sometimes given to the Christadelphians, from the fact that Dr. Thomas organized them into a separate religious body. They believe that immortality is the reward of the righteous, &c. of those who receive the truth, and are baptized, and that others will perish after punishment proportioned to their misdeeds or want of faith. They do not believe in the Trinity or in a personal devil.

Thó-mé'-an (Th as T), s. [See def.]

Church Hist.: One of a body of Christians on the Malabar coast, said to be descendants of the converts of St. Thomas.

Thóm'-ism (Th as T), s. [See def.]

Church Hist.: One of the two great schools of scholasticism, the other being Scotism (q.v.). It derived its name from its founder, St. Thomas Aquinas (1227-74), the Great Dominican doctor. In theology Thomism followed the doctrines of Augustine as to free will and grace, and held that the Virgin Mary was sanctified after her body was informed by the soul; its philosophy was a moderate Realism. As a system it rests on the Summa of St. Thomas, which is divided into three parts: (1) Of God in himself and as the Creator; (2) of God as the end of creature, and of the actions which lead us to, or separate us from Him; and (3) of the Incarnation, the Sacraments, and the Last Things (i.e., Death, Judgment, Heaven, and Hell). The Dominicans naturally adopted and defended Thomism.

"The obvious difficulties of this theory led later Scientists to modify it till it was scarcely distinguishable from Thomism."—Addis & Arnold: Cath. Dict., p. 761.

Thóm'-ist (Th as T), a. & s. [Eccles. Lat. Thomista = a follower of St. Thomas Aquinas.] [THOMISM.]

A. As adj.: Of, belonging to, or connected with the theology of St. Thomas Aquinas.

"The old Scotist and Thomist theologies were still maintained."—Addis & Arnold: Cath. Dict., p. 774.

B. As subst.: A follower of St. Thomas Aquinas in theology and philosophy.

"The adverse sects of Thomists and Scientists filled Europe with their noisy disputes."—G. H. Lewis: Hist. Philos. (ed. 1880), II, 87.

thó'-mó'-mýs (th as t), s. [Gr. θωμός (thōmōs) = a heap, and μῦς (mūs) = a mouse.]

Zool.: A genus of Geomyiinae, distinguished from the type-genus by having the upper incisors without grooves. There are two species, ranging from the Upper Missouri and Upper Columbia Rivers to Hudson's Bay.

thóm'-sén-ó-lite (th as t), s. [After Dr. Julius Thomsen, of Copenhagen; o connect., and Gr. λίθος (líthos) = a stone.]

Min.: A mineral resulting from the alteration of cryolite (q.v.). Crystallization monoclinic, occurring in prisms with horizontal striæ, and also massive resembling chalcodendrite. Hardness, 2½ to 4; sp. gr. 2.74 to 2.76; lustre, vitreous, on some faces pearly; colour, white; transparent to translucent. Compos.: fluorine, 52.2; aluminium, 15.0; calcium, 15.4; sodium, 7.6; water, 9.8 = 100, which is equivalent to the hitherto accepted formula, 2(CaNa)F + Al₂F₆ + 2H₂O, but Brandl has shown that the formula should be written, [NaCa]F₂ + Al₂F₆ + H₂O.

Thóm'-sō'-ní-àn (Th as T), o. & s. [THOMSONIANISM.]

A. As adjective.

Med.: Of or belonging to the medical system called Thomsonianism (q.v.).

B. As subst.: An adherent of Thomsonianism.

Thóm'-sō'-ní-àn-ism (Th as T), s. [Eng. Thomsonian; -ism.] (See def.)

Med.: A system of medicine founded by Dr. Samuel Thomson, of Massachusetts. The human body is assumed to consist of the four so-called elements—fire, air, earth, and water. Metals and minerals, being ponderous and tending earthward, are supposed to drag down to the earth those who use them as medicines, while vegetables, springing from the ground and tending upwards, are fitted to make those who employ them as remedies move upward to life and health.

thóm'-són-íte (th as t), s. [After R. D. Thomson; suff. -ite (Min.)]

Min.: A member of the group of Zeolites. Crystallization, orthorhombic, occurring as individual crystals but more often in radiated groups, also compact. Hardness, 5 to 5.5; sp. gr. 2.3 to 2.4; lustre, vitreous to pearly; colour when pure, snow-white; brittle; pyroelectric. Compos.: silica, 38.9; alumina, 31.6; lime, 12.9; soda, 4.8; water, 18.8 = 100, which yields the formula 2SiO₂.Al₂O₃.(CaO + ½NaO) 24H₂O. Dana divides as follows: 1. Ordinary: (1) in regular crystals; (2) in slender prisms, sometimes radiated; (3) radiated fibrous; (4) spherical aggregation of radiated fibres or crystals; (5) massive; 2. Mesole: including scoulerite; 3. Chalillite. Occurs in cavities in old amygdaloidal lavas, and sometimes in so-called metamorphic rocks.

thóng, *thwang, *thwangue, *thwong, s. [A.S. thwang; cogn. with Icel. thwengr = a thong, a shoe-latchet. From the same root as TWINE (q.v.).] A leather strip or lash; a strap of leather used for fastening anything.

"At the seams, where the different skins are sewed together, they are commonly ornamented with tassels or fringes of narrow thongs, cut out of the same skins."—Cook: Third Voyage, bk. iv. ch. v.

thong-drill, s. A drill to which rotary motion in alternate directions is communicated by means of a cord. It is mentioned in Homer (Odys. ix. 384).

"Among the Aulentic Islanders the thong-drill, and among the New Zealanders a modification of it, is used for boring holes in stone."—Evans: Ancient Stone Implements, p. 44.

†thong-seal, s.

Zool.: A name sometimes given to Phoca barbata, from the fact that the Greenlanders cut the hide circularly into a long strip, which they use for harpoon lines.

thóng, v.t. or i. [THONG, s.] To beat with a thong; to lash.

thō'-oid, a. & s. [Mod. Lat. tho(u)s; Eng. suff. -oid.]

A. As adj.: A term applied by Huxley to a division of Canidae, containing the Lupine or wolf-like forms, as Canis lupus, C. aureus, C. azaræ, &c. He applied the term Alopecoid to the other division, containing C. argentatus, C. vulpes, &c. (Proc. Zool. Soc., 1880, pp. 238-88.)

"I am disposed . . . to regard Otocyon, and the Thooid and Alopecoid series respectively, as genera, retaining for the two latter the old names of Canis and Vulpes."—Proc. Zool. Soc., 1880, p. 236.

B. As subst.: Any individual of the Thooid series of the family Canidae.

"There is no question that Thooids and Alopecoids similar to those which exist at present inhabited Europe during the Quaternary epoch."—Proc. Zool. Soc., 1880, p. 278.

thóom, s. [THUMB.] (Scotch.)

Thor, s. [Icel. Thórr, contr. from Thonor; A.S. thunor = thunder.] [THUNDER, THURSDAY.]

Scand. Mythol.: The god of thunder, the second principal god of the ancient Scandinavians. He was the son of Odin or the supreme being, and Jörth = the Earth. He is represented as a powerful man in the prime of life, with a long red beard, a crown on his head, a sceptre in one hand, and his hammer in the other. Thursday receives its name from him, and his name also enters into many proper names, as Thorsby in Cumberland, Jorthorwall in Dumfriesshire, &c. His wife was Sif (Love), and his palace Thrudvangr, where he received the warriors who had fallen in battle. He was the champion of the gods, and was called in to their assistance whenever they were in straits. He was also the friend of mankind, and the slayer of trolls and evil spirits. His belt, called Megingard, had the property of doubling his strength whenever he put it on. His hammer or mace was called Mjolinir.

Thor's hammers, s. pl.

Anthrop.: A popular name in the north of Europe for celt.

"In Scandinavia and Northern Germany perforated axes and axes-hammers are frequently known as Thor's hammers."—Evans: Ancient Stone Implements, p. 164.

thór'-a, s. [Eiym. doubtful.]

Bot.: Ranunculus Thora; a species from the Alps. The roots are very acrid and poisonous, and their juice was formerly used by the Swiss hunters to poison their arrows.

thór-răç'-ic, *thór-răç'-ick, a. & s. [Lat. thorax, genit. thoracis = the chest.]

A. As adj.: Of or pertaining to the thorax or chest; as, thoracic arteries.

B. As substantive.

Anat.: A thoracic artery.

thoracic-duct, s.

Anat.: A long narrow vessel in front of the vertebrae, and opening into the veins on the left side of the neck at the angle of union of the subclavian and anterior jugular. It is the chief trunk of the lymphatic system, and the principal canal through which the chyle and lymph are conveyed to the blood.

thoracic-fins, s. pl.

Ichthy.: A term applied to the ventral fins, when they are situated below the pectorals.

thoracic-myalgia, s.

Pathol.: A hot wearying pain in the tendinous insertions of the fleshy bodies of the pectoral and sometimes of the intercostal muscles, arising from overwork. Rest, a flannel bandage round the thorax, friction with anodyne liniments, and attention to the general health are the appropriate remedies.

thoracic-regions, s. pl.

Anat.: Fourteen regions into which the thorax in man is divided by imaginary straight lines, longitudinal and transverse, so that the exact situation of any spot may be described. [ABDOMINAL.]

thór-răç'-i-ca, s. pl. [Mod. Lat., from Lat. thorax (q.v.).]

Zool.: An order of Cirripedia. Carapace either a capitulum or a pedicel, or an operculated shell with a basis. Body formed of six thoracic segments, generally furnished with six pairs of limbs; abdomen rudimentary, but often bearing caudal appendages. Families: Balanidae, Verrucidae, and Lepididae.

thór-răç'-i-ci, s. pl. [Mod. Lat., from thorax (q.v.).]

Ichthy.: A Linnæan group of Fishes (Systema, ed. 12th), having the ventral fins inserted on the abdominal surface below the pectorals.

thór-ă-çip'-ô-dă, s. pl. [Lat. thorax, genit. thoracis, and Gr. ροῦς (rou), genit. ροῦσος (podos) = a foot.]

Zool.: A division of Crustacea, having the special locomotory organs belonging to the thorax. It contains two legions, Podophthalmia and Edriophthalmia (q.v.).

thór-a-cô-, pref. [Gr. θώραξ (thōrax), genit. θωράκος (thōrakos) = a breastplate.] Of, or belonging to, or in any way connected with, the thorax.

thór-a-côç'-ér-ăs, s. [Pref. thoraco-, and Gr. κεράς (keras) = a horn.]

Palæont.: A genus of Orthoceratidae. Shell straight, elongated, conical, with a small, lateral, straight siphuncle. Known species twenty; from the Silurian to the Carboniferous of the United States and Europe.

thór-a-cô-său'-rūs, s. [Pref. thoraco-, and Gr. σαῦρος (sauros) = a lizard.]

Palæont.: A genus of Huxley's Enschia, peculiar to the Chalk of North America. They belong to the Procelia of Owen.

thór'-ah (th as t), s. [TORAH.]

thór'-al, a. [Lat. thorus, torus = a couch, a bed.]

1. Of or pertaining to a bed.

"The punishment of adultery . . . was sometimes made by a thoral separation."—Aylife: Parergon.

2. Appellative of a line in the hand; called also the Mark of Venus.

thór'-ăx, s. [Lat., from Gr. θώραξ (thōrax) = the chest, a breastplate.]

1. Anatomy:

(1) Human: The breast, and specially the bone enclosing it. It is somewhat conical, with convex walls. Its upper opening is contracted, and bounded by the first dorsal vertebra, the first pair of ribs, and the manubrium of the sternum. Its inferior margin slopes downwards on each side to the twelfth rib; its longitudinal axis is directed upwards and somewhat backwards; its transverse diameter at the widest part greatly exceeds the distance from the breast to the back. It consists of the dorsal vertebrae, the sternum, the ribs, and the costal cartilages, and contains the lungs, the heart, &c. The muscles of the thorax are: the intercostals, the levatores costarum, the embocostals, the triangulatis sterni, with which may be included the diaphragm.

(2) Compar.: The part of the trunk above or anterior to the diaphragm.

2. Entom.: The central division of the body of insects. It is formed of three consolidated somites or segments: the prothorax, the mesothorax, and the metathorax.

* 3. Old Armour: A breastplate, cuirass, or corselet; more especially the cuirass or corse-let worn by the ancient Greeks, corresponding to the lorica of the Romans. It consisted of a breast and a backpiece fastened by buckles, and was often richly ornamented.

thor-ya-ti-dæ, s. pl. [Gr. θώραξις (thōrēksis) = armed with a breast-plate.]

Entom.: A family of Necrophaga. Minute, broad, convex beetles, with the prothorax very large; antennae clavate, eleven-jointed; tarsi five-jointed. Known species twenty, all from the borders of the Mediterranean.

thō-rī-næ, s. [THORINUM.]

Chem.: ThO. Thorium oxide; thorinic oxide. Prepared from thorite by reducing it to a fine powder and decomposing with hydrochloric acid. After separation of various metallic oxides, it is treated with potassium sulphate and precipitated as potassium-thorinic sulphate. From the solution of the salt in hot water, ammonia throws down thorinic hydrate, which on ignition yields thorina. It is a white powder of a sp. gr. = 9.402. The ignited oxide is insoluble in hydrochloric and nitric acids, and only difficultly soluble in sulphuric acid.

thō-rin-ia, a. [Eng. thorin(um); -ia.] Pertaining to thorium.

thorinic-oxide, s. [THORINA.]

thō-rī-nūm, s. [Latinised from Thor (q.v.).]

Chem.: Thorium. Atomic weight = 115.7; symbol Th. A divalent metallic element belonging to the group of earth-metals discovered by Berzelius, in 1828, in thorite. It is a very rare element, and is obtained by heating the anhydrous chloride with potassium. The reduced thorium is a gray metallic powder, having a specific gravity of 7.65 to 7.79. When heated, it burns with a bright flame, producing snow-white thorina without any trace of fusion. It is not oxidised by either hot or cold water, dissolves slowly in nitric and sulphuric acids, more easily in hydrochloric acid, and is not attacked by caustic alkalis.

Chem.: ThCl₄. Prepared by heating an intimate mixture of thorina and charcoal in a stream of dry chlorine gas. It is deposited on the cool part of the tube in white, shining crystals, which are rectangular, four-sided tables. They deliquesce in the air, and dissolve in water with rise of temperature.

thorium-hydrate, s.

Chem.: Th(OH)₄. Obtained as a gelatinous mass by the action of caustic alkalis on solutions of thorium salts. Under the air-pump it dries up into a white powder, readily soluble in all acids, excepting oxalic, molybdic, and hydrofluoric acids.

thorium-oxide, a. [THORINA.]

thorium-sulphide, s.

Chem.: ThS. Thorium burns in the vapour of sulphur, forming a yellow pulverulent sulphide, which acquires metallic lustre by pressure. It is very slowly attacked by acids, and is converted into thorina by roasting.

thōr-ite, s. [Eng. thor(ium); suff. -ite (Min.).]

Min.: An isometric mineral with a tetrahedral habit; occurring in crystals and massive in ayenite, near Brevig, Norway. Also found as pseudomorphs in the form of zircon and orthoclase. Hardness, 4.5 to 5; sp. gr., 4.3 to 5.4; lustre, vitreous to resinous; colour, orange to brownish-yellow, black; streak, light orange to dark-brown. Compos.: essentially a silicate of thorium; silica, 17.0; thorium, 76.2; water, 6.8 = 100, which is equivalent to the formula ThO₂SiO₂ + 1½H₂O.

thōr-i-um, a. [THORINUM.]

thorn, * thorne, s. [A.S. thorn; cogn. with Dut. doorn; Icel. thorn; Dan. tjørn; Sw. törne; Ger. dorn; Goth. thaurnus.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Literally:

(1) Any sharp-pointed projection likely to lacerate the hand, on the stem or any other part of a shrub, tree, or herb. Popularly, it includes both a botanical thorn and a prickle.

(2) A thorny shrub, tree, or herb; often used in this sense in composition, as the Blackthorn the Hawthorn, &c. When the word thorn is used alone, it generally signifies a hawthorn. In Scripture, and especially in the Old Testament, thorn is a generic word including various spinous plants belonging to different families. Precision in identifying them all is impossible.

2. Figuratively:

(1) Anything that pricks or annoys as a thorn; anything painful, irritating, or troublesome; a source of annoyance or trouble; an obstacle, a trouble, a care.

"No traveller ever reached that blessed abode,
Who found not thorns and briars in his road."
Cooper: Epistle to an Afflicted Lady.

(2) The same as THORN-LETTER (q.v.).

II. Bot.: A sharp conical projection constituting the growing point of a branch which has proved abortive. That this is its origin is shown by the fact that sometimes trees, which are thorny in their wild state, have their spines converted into branches when long cultivated in a garden, as is the case with the apple and the pear. A thorn differs from a prickle, which is so superficial that it comes away when the bark is peeled off, while in similar circumstances a thorn, being deep seated, remains. Sometimes thorns bear leaves, as in the Whitethorn.

thorn-apple, s.

Bot.: Datura Stramonium.

thorn-bush, s. A shrub that bears thorns.

"The lantern is the moon; I, the man in the moon; this thorn-bush, my thorn-bush; and this dog, my dog."
Shakespeare: Midsummer Night's Dream, v. 1.

thorn-but, s. A turbot (q.v.).

thorn-devil, s. [MOLOCH, II. 2.]

thorn-headed worms, s. pl.

Zool.: The Acanthocephala (q.v.), so named because they have a trunk or proboscis armed with hooks by which they can attach themselves to, or penetrate, the coats of the intestines of their hosts.

thorn-hedge, s. A hedge or fence composed of thorns.

thorn-letter, s. A name given to the letter Þ (= th) in Anglo-Saxon, and the corresponding character in Icelandic.

thorn-moth, s.

Entom.: More than one species of Geometer Moths. The Purple Thorn is Selenia illustrelata; the Early Thorn, S. illumaria; and the Canary Shouldered Thorn, Ennomos tilitaria.

thorn-set, a. Set or planted with thorns.

thorn-tailed agama, s.

Zool.: A popular name for any species of the genus Uromastix (q.v.).

* thorn, v. t. [THORN, s.] To prick or pierce with, or as with a thorn.

"The only rose of all the stock
That never thorn'd him."
Tennyson: Harold, l. 1.

thorn'-bäck, a. [Eng. thorn, s., and back.]

Ichthy.: Raja clavata, one of the commonest of the British Rays, occurring all round the coast. It is dark-brown in colour, with lighter spots; the whole upper surface is covered with asperities, and a variable number of large spines, like recurved nails, more abundant in the female than in the male, but always extending down the tail in the median line. It is in the best condition in November, but is not highly esteemed as a food-fish.

* thorn'-less, a. [Eng. thorn, s.; -less.] Free from thorns. (Lit. & Fig.)

"Youth's gay prime and thornless path."
Coleridge: Bonnet to Bowler.

thorn'-tail, s. [Eng. thorn, s., and tail.]

Ornith.: A popular name for the species of two genera of Humming-birds—Gouldia (four species) and Discura (one). The tail-feathers in the first genus are much elongated and sharply pointed, and the tail are covered with a tuft of feathers. Discura has a racket at the end of the tail.

thorn'-y, * thorn-le, a. [Eng. thorn, s.; -y.]

I. Lit.: Full of thorns or spines; rough with thorns or prickles.

"He in the thick woven covert
Painfully tugs, or in the thorny brake
Torn and embarrass'd bleeds."
Somerville: Chase, l.

II. Figuratively:

* 1. Sharp, pricking, piercing.
"No dislike against the person
Of our good queen, but the sharp thorny points
Of my alleged reasons drive this forward."
Shakespeare: Henry VIII., ii. 4.

2. Troublesome, vexatious, perplexing, harassing.
"The thorny point of bare distress."
Shakespeare: As You Like It, ii. 1.

thorny-clams, a. pl.

Zool.: The family Chamidae.

thorny-oyster, s.

Zool.: A popular name for any individual of the genus Spondylus (q.v.). The lower valve in old specimens is almost always spiny.

thorny-restharrow, s. [RESETHARROW.]

† thorny-trefoil, s.

Bot.: Fagonia trifolium, a Beau-caper.

thōr'-ūgh (gh silent), * thor-ow, * thor-u, * thor-owe, * thor-ugh, * thorw, * thurh, a., adv., prep., & s. [A later form of through (q.v.).]

A. As adjective:

1. Passing through.
"Let all three sides be a double house, without through lights on the sides."
Bacon: Of Building.

2. Passing through or to the end; hence, complete, perfect.

"The Irish horseboys, in the thorough reformation of that realm, should be cut off."
Spenser: State of Ireland.

3. Thorough-going.

"In conclusion, he urged them to be thorough in what they undertook."
Observer, Dec. 20, 1888.

B. As adverb:

1. Thoroughly.
"Thorns rushed."
Chaucer: Flower & Leaf.

2. Through.

"No, though the serpent's sting should pierce me through."
Byron: Heaven & Earth, l. 1.

* C. As preposition:

1. Through.
"On mountains, thoro' hrambles, pits, and fouds."
Beaumont & Fletcher: Philaster, iv.

2. By means of.

D. As substantive:

I. Ordinary Language:

* 1. A passage, a thoroughfare; a channel; any means of passage.

"The alteration must be from the head by making other thoroughgs and devices."
Braunford: Works, l. 303.

2. An interfurrow between two ridges; a channel for water. (Prov.)

II. Eng. Hist.: A word used in the reign of Charles I. by Wentworth, Earl of Strafford, in his confidential correspondence, to express the scheme he meditated for subverting the liberties of his countrymen and making Charles an absolute monarch.

"To this scheme, in his confidential correspondence, he gave the expressive name of Thorough."
Macculay: Hist. Eng., ch. 1.

through-bass, through-base, a.

[BAES (3), s., ¶.]

bēl, bōy; pōut, jōwl; cat, cell, chorns, chin, bench; go, gem; thin, this; sin, as; expect, Xenophon, exist. ph = f. -sian, -tian = shān. -tion, -sion = shūn; -fion, -gion = zhūn. -cions, -tions, -sions = shūs. -ble, -dle, &c. = bēl, dēl.

Thóm'-as-ite (Th as T), s. [From John Thomas, M.D., born in London, 1805, died at Worcester, Mass., 1871.]

Church Hist.: A controversial name sometimes given to the Christadelphians, from the fact that Dr. Thomas organized them into a separate religious body. They believe that immortality is the reward of the righteous, i.e. of those who receive the truth and are baptized, and that others will perish after punishment proportioned to their misdeeds or want of faith. They do not believe in the Trinity or in a personal devil.

Thóm'-mé'-an (Th as T), s. [See def.]

Church Hist.: One of a body of Christians on the Malabar coast, said to be descendants of the converts of St. Thomas.

Thóm'-ism (Th as T), s. [See def.]

Church Hist.: One of the two great schools of scholasticism, the other being Scotism (q.v.). It derived its name from its founder, St. Thomas Aquinas (1227-74), the Great Dominican doctor. In theology Thomism followed the doctrines of Augustine as to free will and grace, and held that the Virgin Mary was sanctified after her body was informed by the soul; its philosophy was a moderate Realism. As a system it rests on the Summa of St. Thomas, which is divided into three parts: (1) Of God in himself and as the Creator; (2) of God as the end of creatures, and of the actions which lead us to, or separate us from Him; and (3) of the Incarnation, the Sacraments, and the Last Things (i.e., Death, Judgment, Heaven, and Hell). The Dominicans naturally adopted and defended Thomism.

"The obvious difficulties of this theory led later Scotists to modify it till it was scarcely distinguishable from Thomism."—Addis & Arnold: Cath. Dict., p. 751.

Thóm'-ist (Th as T), a. & s. [Eccles. Lat. Thomista = a follower of St. Thomas Aquinas.] [THOMISM.]

A. As adj.: Of, belonging to, or connected with the theology of St. Thomas Aquinas.

"The old Scotist and Thomist theologues were still maintained."—Addis & Arnold: Cath. Dict., p. 274.

B. As subst.: A follower of St. Thomas Aquinas in theology and philosophy.

"The adverse sects of Thomists and Scotists filled Europe with their noisy disputes."—G. E. Lewis: Hist. Philoa. (ed. 1880), li. 67.

thō'-mō'-mýs (th as t), s. [Gr. θωμός (thōmōs) = a heap, and μῦς (mys) = a mouse.]

Zool.: A genus of Geomyiinae, distinguished from the type-genus by having the upper incisors without grooves. There are two species, ranging from the Upper Missouri and Upper Columbia Rivers to Hudson's Bay.

thóm'-sén-ō-lite (th as t), s. [After Dr. Julius Thomsen, of Copenhagen; o connect., and Gr. λίθος (lithos) = a stone.]

Mfn.: A mineral resulting from the alteration of cryolite (q.v.). Crystallization monoclinic, occurring in prisms with horizontal striae, and also massive resembling chalcodite. Hardness, 2.5 to 4; sp. gr. 2.74 to 2.76; lustre, vitreous, on some faces pearly; colour, white; transparent to translucent. Compos.: fluorine, 52.2; aluminium, 15.0; calcium, 15.4; sodium, 7.6; water, 9.8 = 100, which is equivalent to the hitherto accepted formula, $2(\text{CaNa})\text{F} + \text{Al}_2\text{F}_6 + 2\text{H}_2\text{O}$; but Brandl has shown that the formula should be written, $[\text{NaCa}]\text{F}_2 + \text{Al}_2\text{F}_6 + \text{H}_2\text{O}$.

Thóm'-sō'-ni'-an (Th as T), a. & s. [THOMONIANISM.]

A. As adjective.

Med.: Of or belonging to the medical system called Thomsonianism (q.v.).

B. As subst.: An adherent of Thomsonianism.

Thóm'-sō'-ni'-an-ism (Th as T), s. [Eng. Thomsonian; -ism.] (See def.)

Med.: A system of medicine founded by Dr. Samuel Thomson, of Massachusetts. The human body is assumed to consist of the four so-called elements—fire, air, earth, and water. Metals and minerals, being ponderous and tending earthward, are supposed to drag down to the earth those who use them as medicines, while vegetables, springing from the ground and tending upwards, are fitted to make those who employ them as remedies move upward to life and health.

thóm'-són-ite (th as t), s. [After R. D. Thomson; suff. -ite (Mfn.).]

Mfn.: A member of the group of Zeolites. Crystallization, orthorhombic, occurring as individual crystals but more often in radiated groups, also compact. Hardness, 5 to 5.5; sp. gr. 2.3 to 2.4; lustre, vitreous to pearly; colour when pure, snow-white; brittle; pyro-electric. Compos.: silices, 38.9; alumina, 31.6; lime, 12.9; soda, 4.8; water, 13.8 = 100, which yields the formula $2\text{SiO}_2 \cdot \text{Al}_2\text{O}_3 \cdot \text{CaO} + 3\text{NaO} \cdot 2\text{H}_2\text{O}$. Dana divides as follows: 1. Ordinary: (1) in regular crystals; (2) in slender prisms, sometimes radiated; (3) radiated fibrous; (4) spherulic aggregation of radiated fibres or crystals; (5) massive; 2. Mesole: including acoulerite; 3. Chalillite. Occurs in cavities in old amygdaloidal lavas, and sometimes in so-called metamorphic rocks.

thóng, *thwang, *thwangue, *thwong, s. [A.S. thwang; cogn. with Icel. thwangr = a thong, a shoe-latchet. From the same root as TWINE (q.v.).] A leather strip or lash; a strap of leather used for fastening anything.

"At the seams, where the different skins are tacked together, they are commonly ornamented with tassels or fringes of narrow thongs, cut out of the same skins."—Cook: Third Voyage, bk. iv, ch. v.

thong-drill, s. A drill to which rotatory motion in alternate directions is communicated by means of a cord. It is mentioned in Homer (Odys. ix. 384).

"Among the Aleutian Islanders the thong-drill, and among the New Zealanders a modification of it, is used for boring holes in stone."—Evans: Ancient Stone Implements, p. 44.

Zool.: A name sometimes given to Phoca barbata, from the fact that the Greenlanders cut the hide circularly into a long strip, which they use for harpoon lines.

thóng, v.t. or i. [THONG, s.] To beat with a thong; to lash.

thō'-oid, a. & s. [Mod. Lat. tho(u)s; Eng. suff. -oid.]

A. As adj.: A term applied by Huxley to a division of Canidae, containing the Lupina or wolf-like forms, as Canis lupus, C. aureus, C. azare, &c. He applied the term Alopecoid to the other division, containing C. argentatus, C. vulpes, &c. (Proc. Zool. Soc., 1880, pp. 238-88.)

"I am disposed . . . to regard Otocyon, and the Thoid and Alopecoid series respectively, as genera, retaining for the two latter the old names of Canis and Vulpes."—Proc. Zool. Soc., 1880, p. 236.

B. As subst.: Any individual of the Thoid series of the family Canidae.

"There is no question that Thoids and Alopecoids similar to those which exist at present inhabited Europe during the Quaternary epoch."—Proc. Zool. Soc., 1880, p. 278.

thóom, s. [THUMB.] (Scotch.)

Thor, s. [Icel. Thórr, contr. from Thonor; A.S. thunor = thunder.] [THUNDER, THURSDAY.]

Scand. Mythol.: The god of thunder, the second principal god of the ancient Scandinavians. He was the son of Odin or the supreme being, and Jörth = the Earth. He is represented as a powerful man in the prime of life, with a long red beard, a crown on his head, a sceptre in one hand, and his hammer in the other. Thursday receives its name from him, and his name also enters into many proper names, as Thorsby in Cumberland, Jorthorward in Dumfriesshire, &c. His wife was Sif (Love), and his palace Thryvangr, where he received the warriors who had fallen in battle. He was the champion of the gods, and was called in to their assistance whenever they were in straits. He was also the friend of mankind, and the slayer of trolls and evil spirits. His belt, called Megingjard, had the property of doubling his strength whenever he put it on. His hammer or mace was called Mjöltnir.

Thor's hammers, s. pl.

Anthrop.: A popular name in the north of Europe for cells.

"In Scandinavia and Northern Germany perforated axes and axes-hammers are frequently known as Thor's hammers."—Evans: Ancient Stone Implements, p. 164.

thör'-a, s. [Etyim. doubtful.]

Bot.: Ranunculus Thora; a species from the Alps. The roots are very acrid and poisonous, and their juice was formerly used by the Swiss hunters to poison their arrows.

thō-răc'-ic, *thō-răc'-ick, a. & s. [Lat. thorax, genit. thoracis = the chest.]

A. As adj.: Of or pertaining to the thorax or chest; as, thoracic arteries.

B. As substantive.

Anat.: A thoracic artery.

thoracic-duct, s.

Anat.: A long narrow vessel in front of the vertebrae, and opening into the veins on the left side of the neck at the angle of union of the subclavian and anterior jugular. It is the chief trunk of the lymphatic system, and the principal canal through which the chyle and lymph are conveyed to the blood.

thoracic-fins, s. pl.

Ichthy.: A term applied to the ventral fins, when they are situated behind the pectorals.

thoracic-myalgia, s.

Pathol.: A hot wearying pain in the tendinous insertions of the fleshy bodies of the pectoral and sometimes of the intercostal muscles, arising from overwork. Rest, a flannel bandage round the thorax, friction with anodyne liniments, and attention to the general health are the appropriate remedies.

thoracic-regions, s. pl.

Anat.: Fourteen regions into which the thorax in man is divided by imaginary straight lines, longitudinal and transverse, so that the exact situation of any spot may be described. [ABDOMINAL.]

thō-răc'-i-ca, s. pl. [Mod. Lat., from Lat. thorax (q.v.).]

Zool.: An order of Cirripedia. Carapaces either a capitulum or a pedicel, or an operculated shell with a basis. Body formed of six thoracic segments, generally furnished with six pairs of limbs; abdomen rudimentary, but often bearing caudal appendages. Families: Balanidae, Verrucidae, and Lepididae.

thō-răc'-i-ci, s. pl. [Mod. Lat., from thorax (q.v.).]

Ichthy.: A Linnæan group of Fishes (Systema, ed. 12th), having the ventral fins inserted on the abdominal surface below the pectorals.

thō-ră-cip'-ō-da, s. pl. [Lat. thorax, genit. thoracis, and Gr. ροῦς (rous), genit. ροῦσος (podos) = a foot.]

Zool.: A division of Crustacea, having the apical locomotory organs belonging to the thorax. It contains two legions, Podophthalmia and Edriophthalmia (q.v.).

thō-ră-cō-, pref. [Gr. θώραξ (thōrax), genit. θωράκος (thōrakos) = a breastplate.] Of, or belonging to, or in any way connected with, the thorax.

thō-ră-cōc'-ēr-ās, s. [Pref. thoraco-, and Gr. κεράς (keras) = a horn.]

Palæont.: A genus of Orthoceratidae. Shell straight, elongated, conical, with a small, lateral, straight siphuncle. Known species twenty; from the Silurian to the Carboniferous of the United States and Europe.

thō-ră-cō-sau'-rūs, s. [Pref. thoraco-, and Gr. σαῦρος (sauros) = a lizard.]

Palæont.: A genus of Huxley's Eosuchia, peculiar to the Chalk of North America. They belong to the Procelia of Owen.

thō-ră-gh (th as t), s. [TORAH.]

thō-ră-ql, a. [Lat. thorus, torus = R couch, a bed.]

1. Of or pertaining to a bed.

"The punishment of adultery . . . was sometimes made by a thoral separation."—Aylife: Parergon.

2. Appellative of a line in the hand; called also the Mark of Venus.

thō-ră-āx, s. [Lat., from Gr. θώραξ (thōrax) = the chest, a breastplate.]

1. Anatomy:

(1) Human: The breast, and specially the bones enclosing it. It is somewhat conical, with convex walls. Its upper opening is contracted, and bounded by the first dorsal vertebra, the first pair of ribs, and the manubrium of the sternum. Its inferior margin slopes downwards on each side to the twelfth rib; its longitudinal axis is directed upwards and somewhat backwards; its transverse diameter at the widest part greatly exceeds the distance from the breast to the back. It consists of the dorsal vertebrae, the sternum, the ribs, and the costal cartilages, and contains the lungs, the heart, &c. The muscles of the thorax are: the intercostals, the levatores costarum, the subcostals, the triangulæ sterni, with which may be included the diaphragm.

(2) Compar.: The part of the trunk above or anterior to the diaphragm.

2. Entom.: The central division of the body of insects. It is formed of three consolidated somites or segments: the prothorax, the mesothorax, and the metathorax.

* 3. Old Armour: A breastplate, cuirass, or corselet; more especially the cuirass or corse-let worn by the ancient Greeks, corresponding to the lorica of the Romans. It consisted of a breast and a backpiece fastened by buckles, and was often richly ornamented.

thōr-īo'-tī-dæ, a. pl. [Gr. θώρακίης (thōrēkēēs) = armed with a breast-plate.]

Entom.: A family of Negerophaga. Mioute, broad, convex beetles, with the prothorax very large; antennæ clavate, eleven-jointed; tarsi five-jointed. Known species twenty, all from the borders of the Mediterranean.

thō-rī-næ, s. [THORINUM.]

Chem.: ThO. Thorium oxide; thorinic oxide. Prepared from thorite by reducing it to a fine powder and decomposing with hydrochloric acid. After separation of various metallic oxides, it is treated with potassium sulphate and precipitated as potassium-thorinic sulphate. From the solution of the salt in hot water, ammonia throws down thorinic hydrate, which on ignition yields thorina. It is a white powder of a sp. gr. = 9.402. The ignited oxide is insoluble in hydrochloric and nitric acids, and only difficultly soluble in sulphuric acid.

thō-rīn-īo, a. [Eog. thorin(um); -īo.] Pertaining to thorium.

thorinic-oxide, s. [THORINA.]

thō-rī-nūm, s. [Latinised from Thor (q.v.).]

Chem.: Thorium. Atomic weight = 115.7; symbol Th. A divalent metallic element belonging to the group of earth-metals discovered by Berzelius, in 1828, in thorite. It is a very rare element, and is obtained by heating the anhydrous chloride with potassium. The reduced thorium is a gray metallic powder, having a specific gravity of 7.65 to 7.79. When heated, it burns with a bright flame, producing snow-white thorina without any trace of fusion. It is not oxidised by either hot or cold water, dissolves slowly in nitric and sulphuric acids, more easily in hydrochloric acid, and is not attacked by caustic alkalis.

Chem.: ThCl₂. Prepared by heating an intimate mixture of thorina and charcoal in a stream of dry chlorine gas. It is deposited on the cool part of the tube in white, shining crystals, which are rectangular, four-sided tables. They deliquesce in the air, and dissolve in water with rise of temperature.

thorium-hydrate, s.

Chem.: Th(HO)₂. Obtained as a gelatinous mass by the action of caustic alkalis on solutions of thorium salts. Under the air-pump it dries up into a white powder, readily soluble in all acids, excepting oxalic, molybdic, and hydrofluoric acids.

thorium-oxide, s. [THORINA.]

thorium-sulphide, s.

Chem.: ThS. Thorium burns in the vapour of sulphur, forming a yellow pulverulent sulphide, which acquires metallic lustre by pressure. It is very slowly attacked by acids, and is converted into thorina by roasting.

thōr'-īte, s. [Eng. thor(ium); suff. -īte (Min.).]

Min.: An isometric mineral with a tetrahedral habit; occurring in crystals and massive in syenite, near Brevig, Norway. Also found as pseudomorphs in the form of zircon and orthoclase. Hardness, 4.5 to 5; sp. gr., 4.3 to 5.4; instre, vitreous to resinous; colour, orange to brownish-yellow, black; streak, light orange to dark-brown. Compos. essentially a silicate of thorina; silica, 17.0; thorina, 76.2; water, 6.8 = 100, which is equivalent to the formula ThO₂SiO₂ + 1/4H₂O.

thōr'-ī-ūm, s. [THORINUM.]

thorn, * thorne, s. [A.S. thorn; cogn. with Dut. doorn; Icel. thorn; Dan. tjørn; Sw. törne; Ger. dorn; Goth. thaurnus.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Literally:

(1) Any sharp-pointed projection likely to lacerate the hand, on the stem or any other part of a shrub, tree, or herb. Popularly, it includes both a botanical thorn and a prickle.

(2) A thorny shrub, tree, or herb; often used in this sense in composition, as the Blackthorn the Hawthorn, &c. When the word thorn is used alone, it generally signifies a hawthorn. thorn-apple, s.

Bot.: Datura Stramonium.

thorn-bush, s. A shrub that bears thorns.

"The lantern is the moon; I, the man in the moon;
This thorn-bush, my thorn-bush; and this dog, my dog."
Shakespeare: Midsummer Night's Dream, v. 1.

thorn-but, s. A turbot (q.v.).

thorn-devil, s. [MOLOCH, II. 2.]

thorn-headed worms, s. pl.

Zool.: The Acanthocephala (q.v.), so named because they have a trunk or proboscis armed with hooks by which they can attach themselves to, or penetrate, the coats of the intestines of their hosts.

thorn-hedge, s. A hedge or fence composed of thorns.

thorn-letter, s. A name given to the letter þ (= th) in Anglo-Saxon, and the corresponding character in Icelandic.

thorn-moth, s.

Entom.: More than one species of Geometer Moths. The Purple Thorn is Selenia illustrata; the Early Thorn, S. illumarina; and the Canary Shouldered Thorn, Ennomos tiliaria.

thorn-set, a. Set or planted with thorns.

thorn-tailed agama, s.

Zool.: A popular name for any species of the genus Uromastix (q.v.).

* thorn, v.t. [THORN, s.] To prick or pierce with, or as with a thorn.

"The only rose of all the stock
That never thorn'd him."
Tennyson: Harold, l. 1.

thorn'-bäck, s. [Eng. thorn, a., and back.]

Ichthy.: Raja clavata, one of the commonest of the British Rays, occurring all round the coast. It is dark-brown in colour, with lighter spots; the whole upper surface is covered with asperities, and a variable number of large spines, like recurved balls, more abundant in the female than in the male, but always extending down the tail in the median line. It is in the best condition in November, but is not highly esteemed as a food-fish.

* thorn'-læss, a. [Eng. thorn, s.; -læss.] Free from thorns. (Lit. & Fig.)

"Youth's gay prime and thornless path."
Coleridge: Sonnet to Bowler.

thorn'-täll, s. [Eng. thorn, s., and tall.]

Ornith.: A popular name for the species of two genera of Humming-birds—Gouldia (four species) and Discura (one). The tail-feathers in the first genus are much elongated and sharply pointed, and the tail is covered with a tuft of feathers. Discura has a racket at the end of the tail.

thorn'-y, * thorn-le, a. [Eng. thorn, s.; -y.]

I. Lit.: Full of thorns or spines; rough with thorns or prickles.

"He in the thick woven covert
Painfully tugs, or in the thorny brake
Torn and embarrassed bleeds."
Somerville: Chase, l.

II. Figuratively:

thorough-going, a. Going through, or to the end or bottom; going or ready to go to any lengths; extreme, thorough.

"Multiplication of proprietors is not the kind of reform which finds favour with a large section of more thorough-going land reformers."—J. S. Mill: Discourses; Advice to Land Reformers.

thorough-lighted, a. Lighted so that the light passes right through. Applied to a room or building that has windows on opposite sides, the light not being intercepted by partitions.

thorough-paced, a. Perfectly trained to go through all the paces of a well-trained horse; hence, perfect or complete; thorough; thorough-going; going all lengths.

"For he [Gregory of Huntington] was thorough-paced in three tongues, Latin, Greek [as appears by his many comments on those grammarians] and Hebrew."—Fuller: Worthies; Huntingtonshire.

thorough-pin, s. A disease in horses, which consists of enlarged mucous capsules on each side of the hocks, giving somewhat the appearance as if a pin had been thrust through.

"When the joint capsule becomes distended with fluid, it not only protrudes in front of the hock, filling up the hollow, which is characteristic of the healthy joint, but it also exhibits itself in the form of a soft swelling at the upper part of the joint, in the space within the bone which forms the joint of the hock and the bone of the leg directly in front of it. This swelling appears on both sides of the leg, and from its position is called a thorough-pin. Thorough-pins of the limited form, consisting of small bursal tumours in the space in front of the bone which forms the point of the hock, quite unconnected with the principal joint surface, are of no more consequence than ordinary swellings. Thorough-pins are only serious when they are a part of the disease of the principal capsule, forming, in fact, a portion of a blood or 'bog' spavin."—Field, April 4, 1883.

thorough-spied, a. Fully accomplished; thorough-paced.

"Our thorough-spied republic of Whigs, which contains the bulk of all hopes, pretenders, and professors, are most highly useful to princes."—Swift.

The stem is round, erect, and hairy; the leaves ambesille, opposite, linear-lanceolate, acuminate, serrate, wrinkled, pale underneath and hairy; the involucre cylindrical and imbricated; the twelve to fifteen florets tubular. It grows in bogs in North America. The whole plant is intensely bitter. A decoction of the leaves has been given as a febrifuge. In larger quantities it is emetic, astringent, and aperient. Called also Bonest and Crosswort.

thor-ow, a, &c. [THOROUGH.]

thorp, thorp, s. [A.S. thorp = a village; cogo, with Dut. dorp = a village; Icel. thorp; Dan. torp; Sw. torp = a little farm, a cottage; Goth. thaurp; Ger. dorf.] A group of houses standing together in the country; a village, a hamlet. It occurs principally as an element in place names, and in names derived from places: as, Althorp, Copsmanathorpe, &c.

"Wish for, or welcome, wheresoe'er he came— Among the tenantry of thorpe and vill."—Wordsworth: Excursion, bk. viii.

thos, s. [THOUS.]

thōse, *thos, *thas, a. & pron. [THIS.] Used as the plural of this, but etymologically one of the forms of the plural of this. When those and these are used to express contradiction, those refers to the things first mentioned, or farthest off; these to things last mentioned, or nearer.

thōu (in the objective and dative cases thee, pl. you or ye, pron. [A.S. thū; cogn. with Icel. thú; Goth. thu; Dan., Sw., & Ger. du; Irish & Gael. tu; Wel. ti; Russ. ty; Lat. tu; Gr. σύ, τὸ (su, tu); Pers. tū; Sansc. tram. The A.S. thū was thus declined: nom. thū, genit. thīn, dat. dhe, accus. dhec, dhe; nom. pl. ge, genit. eower, dat. eow, accus. eowic, eow. In the seventeenth century the employment of thou to any one indicated familiarity with him, whether of love or contempt. The use of the plural you for the singular thou was established as early as the beginning of the fourteenth century.] The second personal pronoun of the singular number; used to denote the person spoken to; thyself.

"When pain and anguish wring the brow, A ministering angel thou."—Scott: Marmion, vi. 30.

¶ (1) It was frequently used emphatically in phrases expressive of contempt, reproach, scorn, anger, or the like.

"All that Lord Cobham did was at thy instigation thou viper, for I thou thee, thou traitor."—Coke: To Sir Walter Raleigh, at his Trial of the latter.

(2) The employment of thou by the early Quakers implied that they regarded no man, however exalted his rank, with special reverence. With reference to them Fuller, in the dedication of his Seventh Book, explains the usage of his time in a sentence useful for lexicographical purposes:

"In opposition whereunto we maintain that thou from superiors to inferiors is proper as a sign of command; from equals to equals is passible as a note of familiarity; but from inferiors to superiors, if proceeding from ignorance, hath a smack of clownishness; if from affection, a tone of contempt."

(3) Thou is used now only in address to the Deity, and in poetry.

thōu, v.t. & i. [THOU, pron.]

A. Trans.: To address with the pronoun thou; to treat with familiarity.

"Taunt him with the licence of ink: If thou thou'st him some thrice, it shall not be amiss."—Shaksp.: Twelfth Night, iii. 2.

thought-reader, s. A mesmerist who claims to be able to discover what is passing in another person's mind; an exponent of thought-reading. [MIND-READING.]

thought-reading, s. A branch of mesmerism. Whilst exhibiting their powers its exponents are blindfolded, and claim that without collusion or the aid of confederates they can find articles hidden in their absence, give the numbers of bank-notes, &c. In thought-reading proper the thought-reader holds the hand and pulse of the person to be operated on, and professes to be able, by mesmeric sympathy, to discover what is passing in his mind. [MIND-READER.]

thought-transference, s. A supposed emotional influence of one person's mind upon that of another at a distance.

thought-éd (ough as â), a. [Eng. thought, s.; -ed.] Having thoughts; chiefly in composition: as, sad-thoughted.

*thought-on, a. [Eng. thought, s.; -en.] Having a thought; thinking.

"Be you thoughtful That I came with no ill intent." Shakespeare: Pericles, iv. 3.

thought-ful (ough as â), a. [Eng. thought; -ful.]

1. Full of thought or reflection; contemplative; engaged in or given to meditation.

2. Attentive, careful; having the mind directed to an object.

"It requires much care, and nice observation to extract and separate the precious ore from so much vile matter; so that the understanding must be patient, and wary, and thoughtful in seeking truth."—Glanville: Essay 1.

3. Promoting meditation; favourable to meditation or contemplation.

"War, horrid war, your thoughtful walks invade, And steel now glitters in the muses' shade." Pope: Chorus of Attiliana.

*4. Anxious, solicitous; full of anxiety or care.

"Around her crowd Distrust, and Doubt, and Fear, And thoughtful Foresight and tormenting Care." Prior: Passage in Erasmus Imitated.

5. Exhibiting or evincing thought or care; considerate: as, a thoughtful act or gift.

"Thoughtful, or full of thinking; considerate, or ready to consider; and deliberate, ready to deliberate, rise upon each other in their signification; he who is thoughtful does not forget his duty; he who is considerate pauses, and considers properly what is his duty; he who deliberates considers deliberately. It is a recommendation to a subordinate person to be thoughtful in doing what is wished of him; it is the recommendation of a confidential person to be considerate, as he has often to judge according to his own discretion; it is the recommendation of a person who is acting for himself in critical matters to be deliberate. There is this farther distinction in the word deliberate, that it may be used in the bad sense to mark a settled intention to do evil; young people may sometimes plead, in extenuation of their guilt, that their misdeeds do not arise from deliberate malice.

thought-ful-ly (ough as â), adv. [Eng. thoughtful; -ly.] In a thoughtful or contemplative manner; with thought or consideration; with solicitude or anxiety.

"The Plaster, under his roof of thatch, Snaked thoughtfully and slow." Longfellow: The Quadroon Girl.

† thrāsh, † thrūsh (3), s. [Ety. doubtful.]
Bot.: Various species of Juncus.

thrāsh'-gl, thrash-le, s. [Eng. thrash; -el, -le.] An instrument to thrash with; a flail. (Prov.) thrāsh'-ēr, thrēsh'-ēr, s. [Eng. thrash; -er.]

I. Ord. Lang.: One who thrashes grain, &c.

II. Technically:

1. Ornith.: A popular American name for the genus Harporhynchus, of the sub-family Mimine.

2. Zool.: [ALOPHAS, FOX-SHARK.]

thrāsh'-īng, thrēsh'-īng, pr. par., a., & s. [THRASH.]

A. & B. As pr. par. & particip. adj.: (See the verb.)

C. As substantive:

1. Lit.: The operation by which grain is separated from the straw. It is performed in various ways, by beating with a flail or threshing-machine, or by trampling with the feet of oxen, &c. This last mode was that employed by the nations of antiquity, and is the one still practised in the south of Europe, Persia, India, &c. Oxen were generally employed for this purpose, and sometimes dragged a kind of roller, studded with iron knobs, over the sheaves, which were spread in the form of a circle on the floor, the grain being placed towards the centre. Thrashing by balls is still practised in some parts, but the introduction of thrashing-machines has caused that system to be but little followed, on account of the greater time and labour involved in it, as compared with the machines. Thrashing in Lombardy is generally performed by means of a fluted roller drawn around in a circular track.

"The good red bearded wheel Far, cometh hardly out of the hunk, and asketh some painful thrashing."
P. Holland: Plinie, bk. xviii, ch. xxx.

2. Fig.: A sound flogging or drubbing.

thrashing-floor, s. A floor or area on which grain is thrashed or beaten out. In eastern countries, from the earliest times, thrashing-floors were in the open air, but in colder and moister climates, such floors are necessarily under cover, as in a barn.

"O God, what was the thrashing-floor of a Jebuette to thee, above all other soils?"
Bp. Hall: Contemp.; Numbering of the People.

thrashing-machine, thrashing-mill, s. A machine for thrashing or beating out grain, as wheat, oats, barley, &c., from the straw. The motive power may be that of horses, oxen, water, wind, or steam. Menzies made a machine in Scotland in 1732, and Stirling of Dumbane another in 1758, but they do not seem to have been successful. Meikle, of Inyningham, East Lothian, invented a machine in 1786, which is the type of modern thrashers. Menzies had a series of revolving flails, and Stirling's had a cylinder with arms upon a vertical shaft running at high velocity. Meikle invented the drum with beaters acting upon the grain in the sheaf, which was fed between rollers. The English improvement was to make the beating drum work in a concave known as the beasting, the grain and straw being scutched and rubbed between the two and carried to the shaker, which removed the straw from the grain and chaff, a large amount of grain also falling through the bars of the concave. The English thrashing-machines are driven by engines of from four to six horse-power. The feeding-rollers are three and a-half inches in diameter, and make thirty-five revolutions per minute. The straw-rakes have the same diameter, and make thirty revolutions per minute. The drum has beaters formed by slats on the ends of radial arms, differing in that respect from the American thrashing-machines, which usually have skeleton-cylinders armed with radial teeth. The sheaf, in America, after cutting the band, is spread upon the inclined feed-chute by the person who is feeding, and passed gradually into the throat of the machine, head ends first. In some of the English machines the straw is fed in broadside on, to prevent the breaking of the straw; by this means, only a part of each beater acts upon the ears. In the American machine an inclined chute furnishes the sheaf, head foremost, to the action of the radial teeth that are attached to the skeleton-cylinder, and are opposed to the teeth in the concave plates beneath. A straw-carrier elevates and discharges the straw, slaking out the grain, which falls into the well. A lifting-screw elevates and forwards the grain and chaff from the well to the vibrating shoe that carries the dividing screen, which, with the aid of the blast from the fan in its rear, separates the grain from its accompanying refuse. The clean grain then falls into a forwarding screw that discharges through a spout into a measure or bag. An elevator returns the tailings and unthrashed heads to the cylinder to be worked over. An endless belt furnished with transverse slats, and sometimes covered with an apron, takes the straw from the machine. Some machines are also provided with a straw carrier that elevates and forwards the straw, commonly discharging it on the stack.

Thrāsh'-ite, s. [THRASHITE.]

* thrā-sōn'-īo-al, a. [After Thraso, the name of the braggart in the Latin comedies.]

1. Given to bragging; boasting.

2. Characterized by bragging or boasting; boastful.

"There was never anything so sudden but the fight of two rains and Caesar's threatened brag of—I can't say, and overcame."
Shakespeare: As You Like It, v. 2.

* thrā-sōn'-īo-al-ly, adv. [Eng. thrasonical; -ly.] In a thrasonical or boastful manner; boastfully.

"To brag thrasonically, to boast like Rodomonte."
Johnson, in voce Rodomonte.

* thraste, pret. of v. [THRUST, v.]

thrātch, v. i. [Ety. doubtful; perhaps softened from A.S. thrac, thracu = force.] To gasp convulsively, as one in the agonies of death. (Scotch.) thrau'-lite (au as ōw), s. [Gr. θραυλος (thraulos) = fragile; suff. -ite (Min.).]

Min.: An amorphous mineral found at Bodenmais, Bavaria. Analyses suggest a relationship to Gillinite (q.v.), to which Dana refers it.

thrāve, threave, * threve, s. [Icel. threft = a thrave, from thrija = to grasp; Dan. trave = a score of sheaves; Sw. trafve = a pile of wood; Sw. dial. trave = a thrave.]

1. Twenty-four sheaves or two shocks of corn.

"A dalmen-icker in a thrave
"s a sūn request."
Burns: To a Mouse.

2. The number of two dozen; hence, an indefinite number; a large number.
"He sends forth thraves of ballads to the sale."
Bp. Hall: Satires, iv. 6.

3. A drove, a herd.

thrāv, v. t. & i. [A.S. thraivan = to throw, to twist.]

A. Trans.: To twist, to wrench, to distort, to wreat.

"They winna bide thraving."
Scott: Old Mortality, ch. viii.

B. Intransitive:

1. To cast, to warp.

2. To twist from agony; to writhe. (Scotch.) thrāv (1), s. [THRAW, v.] A twist, a wrench, a distortion.

"To riq after spulse, dell be w'l me if I do not give your craig a thrāv."
Scott: Waverley, ch. xlviii.

thrāv-crook, s. An implement with a crooked head, used for twisting straw ropes, &c. (Scotch.) thrāv (2), s. [A.S. thred.] A pang, a throe (q.v.).

¶ (1) Dead thrāv: The death throes; the last agonies. (The expression, To be in the dead thrāv, is also applied to any object neither dead nor alive, neither hot nor cold.)

(2) Heads and thrāvs: Lying aside by side; the feet of the one by the head of the other.

thrāv'-ward, thrāv'-wart, a. [THRAW, v.] Cross-grained, forward, perverse, backward, reluctant. (Scotch.)

"I have kend the Law this morny year, and moony a thrāvaw job I has had w' her."
Scott: Heart of Midlothian, ch. xiii.

thrāv'-in, thrāv'-a, [THRAW, v.] Distorted; having the appearance of ill-humour; cross-grained, perverse.

thrēad, * thred, * threde, * threed, * thrid, s. [A.S. thred = that which is twisted, a thread, from thraivan = to twist, to throw (q.v.); cogn. with Dut. draad, from draajen = to twist; Icel. thráðr; Dan. tråd; Sw. tråd; Ger. draht, draht = wire, thread, from O. H. Ger. drājan; Ger. drehen = to twist.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Literally:

(1) A compound cord consisting of two or more single yarns, doubled and twisted. In the trade it is divided into lace, stocking, and sewing thread. The doubling and twisting of thread is effected by spindles and flyers operating in a manner similar to the throstle (q.v.). The twist is usually in a direction the reverse of that given to the individual yarns. In a general sense thread denotes the filaments of some fibrous substance, such as cotton, flax, silk, or wool, spun out to considerable length, the common name of such filaments being yarn. Thread is principally used for sewing.

(2) A yarn measure, containing in cotton yarn fifty-four inches, in linen yarn ninety inches, and in worsted yarn thirty-five inches. (Simmonds.)

2. Figuratively:

(1) A fine filament or thread-like body of any kind, as the filament of a flower, or of any fibrous substance, as of bark; a fine filament or line of gold or silver, a filament of melted glass, the line spun by a spider, &c.

"The smallest thread That ever spider twisted from her womb."
Shakespeare: King John, iv. 4.

(2) Used as an emblem of life, as being spun and cut by the Fates.

"Let not Bardolph's vital thread be cut."
Shakespeare: Henry V, III. 4.

(3) Something continued in a long course or tenour.

"There is here a work of fiction prodigiously as such, and never flagging in the thread of its excitement from beginning to end."
Daily Telegraph, Aug. 29, 1885.

(4) Distinguishing property; quality, fineness.

"A neat courtier, of a most elegant thread."
Ben Jonson.

(5) The central line of a stream or water-course. (Bowrier.)

II. Technically:

1. Bot.: A long delicate hair.

2. Mach.: The spiral projecting rib on the shaft of a screw.

3. Mining: A slight vein of ore, smaller than a branch, passing off from the main vein into the rock.

¶ (1) Air threads: The fine white filaments which are seen floating in the air in summer, the production of spiders; gossamer.

(2) Thread and thrum: The good and bad together; an expression borrowed from weaving, the thread being the substance of the warp, and the thrum the end of the warp by which it is fastened to the loom.

"O Fates, come, come, Cut thread and thrum."
Shakespeare: Midsummer Night's Dream, v.

čto, fát, fáre, amidst, what, fáll, father; wě, wět, hère, camel, hěr, thère; pine, pít, sire, sír, marine; gō, pōt, or, wōre, wōlf, wōrk, whō, sōn; mūte, cūb, cūre, unite, cūr, rúle, fúll; trý, Sýrian. sa, ce = ē; ey = ā; qu = kw.

thread-carrier, s.
Knitting-mach.: The hook or eyelet on the carriage through which the yarn passes.

thread-cells, s. pl.
Zool.: Thread-like stinging processes found in the Hydrozoa.

thread-finisher, s. A machine in which thread is treated to give it a smooth and polished surface.

thread-frame, s. The doubling and twisting-mill by which two or more yarns are combined to form a thread. The yarns as they are unwound from the bobbins or cops are passed beneath the surfaces of a solution of gum or starch in a trough; the wetting enables them to be condensed into a more solid thread; they then pass between rollers, by which they are laid parallel, or nearly so, and are thence conducted to a flyer, by which they are twisted together, and to the bobbin, on which they are wound.

thread-gauge, s. A gauge for determining the number of threads to the inch on screws and taps.

thread-guide, s.
Sewing-mach.: A loop, eye, or other contrivance, forming a guide for the thread when it changes its direction at points between the reel and the needle-eye.

thread-lace, s. Lace of linen thread; such as Honiton, and many other kinds.

thread-moulds, s. pl.
Bot.: The Fungi of the group Hyphomycetes.

thread-needle, s. A game in which children stand in a row holding hands, and the outer one still holding the hand of the next runs between the others. Also called Thread-the-needle.

thread-paper, s. Thin strips of paper for wrapping up skeins of thread.

thread-plants, s. pl.
Comm.: Plants whose fibres may be manufactured into thread, as flax, cotton, &c.

thread-waxer, s. A bowl of heated shoemaker's wax, through which the thread is conducted in sewing-machines for boots, shoes, and leather.

thread, v. t. [THREAD, s.]
1. Lit.: To pass a thread through the eye or aperture of.

"The largest crooked needle, with a ligature of the size of that I have threaded it with, in taking up the spermatic vessels."—Sharp: Surgery.

2. Fig.: To pass or pierce through, as through something narrow, interwoven, or intricate.

"A serf that rose betimes to thread the wood,
And hew the bough that bought his children's food."
—Byron: Lara, ll. 24.

thread-bare, *thred-bare, *thrid-bare, a. [Eng. thread, s., and bare.]

1. Lit.: Worn so that the component threads can be traced; worn to the naked thread; having the nap worn off.

"A poor needy fellow in a threadbare cloak."—Camden: Hist. Queen Elizabeth (an. 1518).

2. Fig.: Worn out; trite, hackneyed; used so long that the novelty has worn off.

"Many writers of moral discourses run into stale topics and threadbare quotations, not handling their subjects fully and closely."—Swift.

thread-bare-ness, s. [Eng. threadbare; -ness.] The quality or state of being threadbare; triteness; poverty.

"There was much significance in his look with regard to the coat; it spoke of the sleekness of folly, and the threadbareness of wisdom."—Mackenzie: Man of Feeling, ch. xli.

thread-en, *thread-den, a. [Eng. thread; -en.] Made of thread.

"Some in her threaden fillet still did dide, And true to bondage would not break from thence."
—Shakep.: Compliant of a Lover, 33.

thread-er, s. [Eng. thread, v.; -er.] One who or that which threads; specif., a device for guiding the thread into the eye of a needle.

† thread-iness, s. [Eng. thread(y); -ness.] The state of being thread-like, or drawn out into threads. (Goodrich.) thread-like, a. [Eng. thread, and like.] Resembling a thread; long and fine.

thread-shaped, a. [Eng. thread, and shaped.]
Bot.: Slender, like a thread, as the filaments of most plants and the styles of many.

thread-worm, s. [Eng. thread, and worm.]
Zool.: A popular name for any species of the Nematoidea (q.v.), from their long, filiform body. By some authorities the name is restricted to Oxyurus vermicularis, the Small Threadworm, which infests man. [OXYURUS, TACHOCEPHALUS.]

thread-y, *thred-die, a. [Eng. thread; -y.]

1. Like thread or filament; filamentous, fibrous.

"Branches, like the small and threddie roots of a tree."—Granger: Comment. on Ecclesiastes, p. 225.

2. Containing or carrying thread; covered with thread.

"From hand to hand
The thready shuttle glides along the lines."
—Dyer: Fleeces, III.

threap, threep, *threpe, v. t. & i. [A.S. threapian = to threap, to reprove, to afflict; Icel. threpa = to wrangle, to dispute.]

A. Transitive:
1. To assert with pertinacity; to persist in asserting in reply to denial. (Scotch.)

* 2. To call.

"Sol gold is and luna silver we threpe."
—Chaucer: C. T., 16, 204.

B. Intransitive:
1. To aver or assert with pertinacity; to maintain by dint of assertion. (Scotch.)

* 2. To contend, to quarrel.

"Some cry upon God, some other threpe that he hath forgotten theym."—Bp. Fisher: Sermons.

threap, s. [THREAP, v.] A vehement or pertinacious affirmation; an obstinate decision or determination. (Scotch.)

threas-ure, s. [TREASURE.]

threät, *thret, s. [A.S. threät = (1) a crowd, crush, or throng of people; (2) a great pressure, calamity, trouble, a threat, from threät, pa. t. of threätan = to press extremely, to urge, to afflict, to vex; cogn. with Icel. threäta (pa. t. thraut, pa. par. throtinn) = to fail, to lack; Goth. ushrütan = to trouble, to vex; O. H. Ger. ardrizan = to tire, to vex; M. H. Ger. erdrizen; Ger. verdrissen. From the same root as Lat. trudo = to push, to shove.]

1. Ord. Lang.: A menace; a denunciation of ill to befall some one; a declaration of an intention or determination to inflict punishment, loss, or pain on another.

"There is no terror, Cassius, in your threats."
—Shakep.: Julius Cæsar, iv. 3.

2. Law: Any menace of such a kind as to unsettle the mind of the person threatened, and to take away from his acts that free voluntary action which alone constitutes consent.

"By threats and menaces of bodily hurt, through fear of which a man's business is interrupted. Here the party menaced may either apply to a magistrate to have the offender bound over to recognizance to keep the peace; or he may sue for damages in a civil action."—Blackstone: Comment., bk. iii., ch. 8.

threät, *threte, *thret-i-en, v. t. & i. [A.S. threätian.] [THREAT, s.]

A. Trans.: To threaten, to menace.

"The demon Indolence threatens overthrow To all that to mankind is good and dear."
—Thomson: Castle of Indolence, ll. 24.

B. Intrans.: To threaten; to utter threats.

"So can he threat and menace."
—Romans of the Rose.

threät-en, *thret-en, *thret-nen, v. t. & i. [Eng. threat; -en.]

A. Transitive:
1. To use threats or menaces to; to menace; to declare an intention or determination of inflicting punishment, pain, or loss on; to terrify or attempt to terrify by menaces; to denounce ill, loss, or mischief to befall another.

"Bohemls stops his ears, and threatens them With divers deaths in death."
—Shakep.: Winter's Tale, v. 1.

* 2. To charge or enjoin with menace.

"Let us straitly threaten them, that they speak henceforth to no man in this name."—Acts iv. 17.

-clan, -tlan = shan. -tion, -sion = shün; -tion, -sion = zhün. -cious, -tious, -sious = shüs. -ble, -dle, &c. = bel, del

(2) Three-times-three: Three cheers three repeated. (Tennyson: In Memoriam, conc. 104.)

¶ Three is largely used as the first element in compounds, denoting something which contains three parts, portions, organs, or the like: as, three-edged, three-headed, three-pointed, three-stringed, &c.

* three-aged, a. Living during three generations.

three-bearded rockling, a. [MOTTELLA.]

three-box loom, s.

Weaving: A loom having three shuttle-boxes, from which shuttles carrying yarns of as many colours are driven by the picker, according to the requirements of the pattern.

three-capsuled, a.

Bot.: Having three capsules.

three-celled, a.

Bot.: Having three cells; trilobular.

Three Chapters, s. pl. [CHAPTER, 3, ¶ (1).]

three-cleft, a.

Bot.: Three-parted; split into three parts or divisions, deeper than when three-lobed.

three-coat work, s.

1. Plastering: Applied to work consisting of three coats or stages.

2. Paint: Applied to house-painting when three successive layers are required.

1. Ord. Lang.: Having three corners or angles: as, a three-cornered hat.

2. Bot.: Having three longitudinal angles and three plane faces, as the stem of Carex acuta.

three-decker, s.

1. A vessel of war carrying guns on three decks.

"The three-decker's oaken spine."
Tennyson: Maud, II. li. 4.

2. A slang term applied to a pulpit, consisting of three stages, the clerk's place being at the bottom, the reading-desk on the second stage, and the pulpit highest of all.

"The modest pulpit of an English church is as yet a rarity, for the complicated and extensive 'three-decker' is still in use all over the country."—Daily Telegraph, Oct. 29, 1885.

three-denominations, s. pl. [DENOMINATION, ¶.]

three-edged, a.

Bot.: Having three acute angles with concave faces, as the stems of many plants; trigonal.

three estates, s. pl. In English politics, the Lords Temporal, the Lords Spiritual, and the Commons, the three elements which make up Parliament, the British legislative body. Of these the first two hold their seats by hereditary claim, the third only is representative. A strong feeling of opposition to hereditary legislators is growing in England, which will probably end in reducing the Three Estates to one only, a representative body. In France the convening of the Third Estate, the representatives of the people, to vote money for the crown, was the step that led to the French Revolution, the people declining to give up the power which had been placed in their hands.

Three F's, phr.

Hist.: A term used to express the demands of the Irish tenantry as formulated by Michael Davitt, the founder of the Land League (q.v.). These were limited to Free Sale, Fifty of Tenure, and Fair Rent. These demands were practically conceded by Mr. Gladstone's Land Act (1881).

three-faces-in-a-hood, s.

Bot.: Viola tricolor. (Britten & Holland.)

* three-farthings, s.

A very thin silver coin of the reign of Elizabeth, bearing a profile of the sovereign with a rose at the back of her head.

three-foot, a.

1. Measuring three feet: as, a three-foot rule.

* 2. Having three feet or legs.

"When on my three-foot stool I sit, and tell The warlike feats I have done."
Shakespeare: Cymbeline, III. 3.

three-girred, a. Surrounded with three hoops. (Scotch.)

three-headed, n. Having three heads.

"Whose eluh kill'd Cerberus, that three-headed canis." Shakespeare: Love's Labour's Lost, v. 2.

Three-headed rail: One having three heads united by webs, set at an angle of 120° with each other.

three-high roll, s.

Metal-work: A rolling apparatus in which three rollers are arranged in a vertical series, so that the metal may be passed through between the middle and lower roll, and then back between the middle and upper one; rolling it at each passage without changing the direction of motion of the rolls.

three-horned chameleon, s.

Zool.: Chameleon owent, from Fernando Po. The male has a long horn over each eye, and another at the end of the muzzle, whence the popular name.

Three Hours' Agony, Three Hours' Service, s.

Eccles. & Church Hist.: A devotion practised on Good Friday, from noon till three o'clock, in commemoration of the Passion. It was introduced by Father Messia, S.J., of Lima, about 1730, and reached Rome in 1738. It was introduced into the English Church about 1865, and was rendered legal by the Act of Uniformity Amendment Act (1872), which permits additional services, consisting of any prayers from the Liturgy or Bible, with address or sermon, and hymns. The service consists, in all cases, of hymns, collects, or litanies, and addresses, generally on "the seven words from the cross," though this last feature is sometimes varied by meditations on other details of the Passion. The editor of the Dictionary of Religion notes that the name of the devotion may possibly occasion a mistake as to the length of our Lord's sufferings. (See Mark xv. 25, 34.) three-humped moth, s.

Entom.: Notodonta triphopus, an amber-brown moth with various markings. It is rare in Britain.

Three Kings, s. pl.

Church Hist. & Eccles.: The name given in the Roman Church to the Magi, who came from the East to adore the infant Jesus (Matt. ii. 1-12). They are probably called kings from Psalm lxxii. 10, which verse is used as an antiphon in the office for Epiphany. According to tradition, their names were Gaspar, Melchior, and Balthazar, and on their return to the East they received baptism. The Empress Helena is said to have brought their bones to Constantinople, whence they were removed to Milan, and afterwards to Cologne. The Chapel of the Three Kings, built in Cologne Cathedral (1459-1519), is supposed to contain their relics.

three-leaved grass, s.

Bot.: The genus Trifolium.

¶ Law of the Three Stages:

Philos.: (See extract.)

"Two-thirds of the objections urged against this Law of the Three Stages are based on a radical misapprehension of it. . . . The law does not assert that at distinct historical periods men were successively in each of the three stages, that there was a time when a nation, or even a tribe, was exclusively theological, exclusively metaphysical, or exclusively positive; it asserts that the chief conceptions man frames respecting the world, himself, and society, must pass through three stages, with varying velocity under various social conditions, but in unvarying order."—*G. "Which bears a grass as soft as in the dainty sleeve, And thrummed so thick and deep!"—Dryden: Poly-Dion, s. 22.

thrummed-mat, s.

Naut.: A mat, or piece of canvas, with short strands of yarn stuck through it, in order to make a rough surface. It is used in a vessel's rigging, about any part, to prevent chaling.

thrumm'-mý, a. [Eng. thrum, s.; -y.] Consisting of, furnished with, or resembling thrums.

"In the middle stands a Colomello thick set with thrummy apicula, which argue this plant being to the malvaceous kind."—Dampier: Voyages, vol. iii.

thrum'-wört, s. [Eng. thrum, and wort.] Botany:

- 1. The genus Actinocarpus (q.v.).
2. Amaranthus caudatus, Love Lies Bleeding, a species of Amaranth, originally from the East Indies, now cultivated in English gardens.

thrush (1), *thrush, s. [Mid. Eng. thrush, from A.S. thrysc; cogn. with O.H. Ger. drosca, whence Ger. drossel. These answer to a Teut. type, thruska. The Lith. strazdas, strazda show that an initial s has been lost. The original form appears to have been star-da. The original sense was prob. chirper, or twitterer; cf. Gr. straxēos (strizein), straxēos (trizein) = to twitter; Lat. strix = the screech-owl.]

Ornith.: The book-name for any of the Turdidæ (q.v.). They are universally distributed except in New Zealand, and are very highly organized birds, and it is for this reason, perhaps, as well as on account of their omnivorous diet, that they have been able to establish themselves on a number of remote islands. They differ widely in their habits and in their habits; some are gregarious, others live solitary or to pairs. The name Thrush is applied to a considerable variety of American birds, belonging to several genera. Of the type genus Turdus there are several species in the United States, including T. mustelinus, the Wood Thrush, common in low, damp woods and thickets in the Eastern States, and famous for its fine vocal powers; and T. fuscescens, the Veery or Wilson's Thrush; a shy and retiring bird, but one of our most delightful songsters. This general shy habit has given to several species the name of Hermit Thrush, variously modified. Of other genera may be named Harporhynchus rufus, the Thrasher or Brown Thrush, a bird chiefly found in the eastern United States, but ranging west to the Rocky Mountains and north to Canada. It is abundant in thickets and shrubbery, and is a charming songster. Europe has several species of the genus Turdus, the best known and most admired being T. musicus, the Song Thrush, Thrush, or Mavis, one of the best known of European song birds, and which in captivity is easily taught simple airs. It is found all over Europe, but leaves some of the northern parts in winter, being thus practically a bird of passage. Other species are T. risicolorus, the Missel Thrush, and T. varius, White's Thrush (q.v.). Europe has various Thrushes of other genera of the family. [MISSEL-THRUSH.]

thrush-like birds, s. pl. [Turdiformes.]

thrush-nightingale, s.

Ornith.: (See extract). In the east of Europe a second species of Nightingale occurs, which, though long known to German bird fanciers as the Sprosser, was first specifically distinguished by Bechstein as Sylvia philomela, and by other authors is called Philomela turdoides or P. major, while it has received the British name thrush-nightingale. This bird, whose regular application it seems would be Daulia philomela, extends its summer range further to the northward than our D. lucinilla.—Yarrell: British Birds (ed. 4th), l. 223.

thrush (2), s. [Etym. doubtful; cf. Dan. tröske = the thrush on the tongue; Sw. törsk; Sw. dial. trösk. Prob. allied to Dan. tår; Sw. tors; Icel. thurr; A.S. thyrr = dry; Dan. törke; Sw. torika; Icel. thurka = drought; Mid. Eng. thurst = thirst.]

1. Pathol.: White-mouth, a variety of stomatitis depending on the presence of a parasitic fungus, Oidium albicans, common in phthisis and other chronic and wasting diseases, usually indicating approaching death. In the thrush of young infants, and that of acute diseases, danger is not indicated. Borax and honey, milk and lime water, magnesia, and gentle aperients are useful; and in more severe cases a solution of chlorate of potash.

2. Veterinary: An affection of the inflammatory and suppurating kind, in the feet of the horse, and some other animals. In the case of the horse it is in the frog.

thrush-fungus, s.

Bot.: Oidium albicans, a microscopic fungus developed in and between the epithelial cells of the mucous membrana of the mouth in thrush. [THRUSH (2), l.]

thrush-lichen, s. -Bot.: Pellidea aphthosa, a lichen, which grows on alpine rocks. The Swedes prescribe it for aphtiae.

thrush-paste, s. An astringent for curing thrush in the feet of horses. It is composed of calamine, verdigris, white vitriol, alum, and tar.

thrush (3), s. [THRASH, s.]

thrust, *threst, *thrist, v.t. & i. [Coel. thrysta = to thrust, to compress, to press, to force, to compel; A.S. threstan = to oppress, to afflict. From the same root as Lat. trudo = to thrust, to push.]

A. Transitive:

1. To push or drive with force; to drive, to force, to impel. (Commonly followed by away, from, in, out, into, &c.)

"Thou wilt needs thrust thy neck into a yoke."—Shakspeare: Much Ado About Nothing, l. 1.

"And into the concession of this Ballarmino is thrust by the force of our argument."—Bp. Taylor: Real Presence, § 4.

4. To stab, to pierce.

"Thrust Talbot with a spear into the back."—Shakspeare: 1 Henry VI., l. 1.

B. Intransitive:

1. To make a thrust or push; to attack with a pointed weapon.

"These four came all afront and mately thrust at me."—Shakspeare: 1 Henry IV., ll. 4.

2. To enter by pushing; to squeeze in.

"I'll be a Spartan while I live on earth; But, when in heav'n I'll stand next to Hercules, And thrust between my father and the God."—Dryden: (Todd).

3. To push forward; to come with force; to press on; to intrude.

"This thrusts amid the throng with furious force; Down goes, at once, the horseman and the horse."—Dryden: Palamon and Arcite, ll. 607.

4. To rush forward; to rush at.

* 1. To thrust on: To impel, to urge forward.

"We make guilty of our disasters the sun, the moon, and stars, as if we were villains on necessity . . . and all that we are evil in, by a divine thrusting on."—Shakspeare: Lear, l. 2.

2. To thrust one's self in (or into): To intrude, to obtrude.

"How dare you thrust yourselves into my private meditations?"—Shakspeare: Henry VIII., ll. 2.

3. To thrust out:

(1) To drive out, to expel.

"They were thrust out of Egypt."—Exodus xii. 33.

(2) To push out; to protrude: as, To thrust out the tongue.

4. To thrust through: To pierce.

"Phineas thrust both of them through."—Numbers xv. 8.

* 5. To thrust together: To compress.

"He thrust the fleece together, and wringed the dew out of it."—Judges vi. 23.

thrust (1), s. [THRAST, v.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. A violent push or drive, as with a pointed weapon, pushed in the direction of its length, or with the hand, foot, or an instrument.

"Nothing there, save death, was mute; Stroke, and thrust, and flash, and cry."—Byron: Siege of Corinth, xxiv.

2. A stab.

"A thrust (quoth he) of a sword, which went in at his side."—P. Holland: Plutarch, p. 71.

3. An assault, an attack.

"There is one thrust at your pure, pretended mechanism."—More: Divine Dialogues.

II. Technically:

1. Mining-engineer: The breaking downward of the roof of a gallery, owing to the weight of the superincumbent strata. Opposed to creep, which is an upheaval of the gallery floor.

2. Husb.: The white whey which last leaves the curd in pressing.

3. Mech.: The force exerted by any body or system of bodies against another body or system, such as the force exerted by ratters or beams against the walls supporting them.

Thrust of an arch:

Build.: The force exerted by the arch stones considered as a combination of wedges, to overturn the abutments or walls from which the arch springs.

thrust-hoe, s. A hoe which is worked by pushing; a Dutch hoe.

* thrust (2), *thurst, s. [THIRST, s.]

thrust-ër, s. [Eng. thrust, v.; -er.] One who thrusts or stabs; in hunting slang, one who pushes or presses forward in front of the rest of the field.

"By the powers, they have found!" plaintively rejoins his companion, who chances to be a recognized thurster in the fullest sense of the term."—Field, Jan. 2, 1855.

thrust-íng, pr. par., a., & s. [THRAST, v.]

A. & B. As pr. par. & particip. adj.: (See the verb).

C. As substantive:

1. The act of pushing or driving with force.

2. The act of squeezing curd with the hand to expel the whey.

3. (Pl.): The white whey or that which is pressed out of the curd by the hand, and of which butter is sometimes made. (Prov.)

thrusting-screw, s. The screw of a screw-press; of a cheese-press, for instance.

thrust-tie (tie as el), s. [THROSTLE.] The thrush.

"No thrushes shrill the bramble bush forsake; No chirping lark the welkin abash invoke."—Gos.

* thrust-y, *thurst-y, a. [THRISTY, s.]

thrustçh'-ër, s. [Etym. doubtful.]

Mech.: An auxiliary high-pressure non-condensing engine.

thry-fal-low, v.t. [THRIFALLOW.]

* thrym'-sə, *thrim'-sə, s. [A.S.] An Anglo-Saxon silver coin, the value of which is doubtful, being stated by some as 3s., by others as 3d., and by others again as the third of a shilling or 4d.

* thryse, adv. [THRICE.]

Thü'-bän, s. [Corrupted Arabic.]

Astron.: A fixed star, a Draconis. It was formerly the brightest star in the constellation, but is now only between the third and the fourth magnitude. Upwards of 4,600 years ago it was situated very near the celestial pole, from which it is now distant nearly 25°.

thud, s. [Of imitative origin, prob. connected with A.S. thóden = a whirlwind, a violent wind.] The sound produced by a blow upon a comparatively soft substance; a noise as that of a heavy stone striking the ground; a stroke or blow causing a dull, hollow sound.

"The fall makes a louder thud in the fields than you would imagine."—Scrivener's Magazine, Nov., 1853, p. 44.

* 1. To play thud: To fall.

"For fear of playing thud on the ground."—Wilson: Noctes Ambrosianæ (Works, l. 73).

thüd, v.i. [THUD, s.] To make a loud, intermittent noise.

"Hers, down poured down his far-fetched floods; Thers, well-fell Irwine stately thüd."—Burns: The Vision.

Thüg, Thag, s. [Hind. thaga = to deceive.]

1. Lit. & Hist. (Pl.): The name given in the northern provinces of India to a fraternity, who looked upon murder as the sole means of staying the wrath of the goddess Kali, and derived their principal means of support from the plunder of their victims. In old times, according to Hindoo mythology, Kali made war upon a race of giants, from every drop of whose blood sprang a demon. These demons multiplied, and at last the goddess created two men to whom she gave handkerchiefs, with which they strangled the infernal beings. When the men had finished their task, the goddess gave them the privilege of using the handkerchiefs against their fellows, and so the class of Thugs was established. Although worshipping a Hindoo goddess, the majority of the Thugs were Muhammadans. They usually travelled in gangs, the members of which had ostensibly some honest calling in their own community, and in selecting their victims always endeavoured to pitch upon persons of property in order that while propitiating the goddess they might enrich her worshippers. Various steps were taken to suppress the Thugs both by the native and the English governments, and in 1829 Lord âte, fát, fáre, amidst, whát, fall, father; wë, wët, hère, camèl, hër, there; pine, pít, síre, sír, marine; gó, pót, or, wóre, wolf, work, whé, sôn; müte, cüb, cüre, unite, cur, rüle, fill; trý, Sýrian. æ, œ = é; ey = ä; qu = kw.

William Bentinck adopted such stringent measures that in six years (1830-35) 2,000 of them were arrested; of these 1,500 were convicted and sentenced to death, transportation, or imprisonment, according to the gravity of the charges proved against them. In 1836 a law was passed making the fact of belonging to a gang of Thugs punishment by imprisonment for life with hard labour, and though some gangs probably linger in districts where British authority or the power of the more enlightened native princes cannot reach, the system is now so broken that it is practically powerless.

"His two most memorable acts are the abolition of sati (suttee), and the suppression of the Thuga."—Encyc. Brit., (ed. 9th), xii. 504.

2. Fig.: A rough. (Amer.)

"Affrays were still common; and the Know-nothing movement came on, and a few thugs terrorized the city with campaign broils, beatings, stabbing, and shooting."—Century Magazine, June, 1885, p. 280.

Thū-gōē, Thā-gī, s. [Hind. thagi.] The practices of the Thuga; Thuggism.

"They [the Thuga] were colouized at Jubbulpore into a trade settlement, where technical instruction was afforded them and their children, and the practice of thuggee has become extinct."—Asiatic & Dana: Amer. Cyclop., xv. 730.

Thū-gīsm, s. [Eng. Thug; -ism.] The system of assassination carried on by the Thugs to appease the goddess Kali, and to secure eternal happiness for themselves.

"Out of this fermenting mass of half-crazy ideas rise strange monstrosities and horrible beliefs. Such a one is Thuggism."—Brown: Peoples of the World, iv. 75.

thū-ī-tēs, † thū-ŷ-tēs, thū-yī-tēs, s. [Mod. Lat. thuja, thyua; suff. -ites.] Palæont.: A genus of Conifers akin to the recent Thuja. Five British species from the British Lower Jurassic rocks.

thū-ja, thū-ya, s. [Lat. thya, thyia, from Gr. θύα (thua), θύια (thúia)] = an African tree with sweet-smelling wood used in making costly furniture; probably the Arbor vite. (See def.)

Bot.: Arbor vite, a genus of Cupressæ; natives of Asia, Africa, and North America. Evergreen trees or shrubs, with monœcious flowers, having the male catkins ovoid and lateral, the female ones solitary and terminal; the former has the pollen of each flower included in four cases attached to the inner face of the scale towards its base; ovary nerved by the bractea, the two forming a semipeltate receptacle with two ovules; seeds sometimes slightly winged. Leaves scale-like, closely imbricated or compressed. Thuja occidentalis, the Western or American Arbor vite, the species commonly planted in gardens, has obovate cones, with the interior scales truncate and gibbous beneath the apex. It grows best in cool swampy places. The wood is fitted for posts and rails, the branches for brooms, which have a certain fragrance. It is a tree from 20 to 50 feet high, but when under cultivation is generally much smaller. It is well adapted for hedges, bearing cutting well. T. orientalis, the Oriental or Chinese Arbor vite, occurring on rocky ridges in Siberia, China, and Japan, has the cones elliptic, with the interior scales blunt and mucronate below the apex. T. pendula, a native of Tartary, has globose cones, and filiform pendulous branches. All the species are stimulating and diuretic.

thuja-oil, s.

Chem.: Obtained by distilling the ends of the branches and leaves of Thuja occidentalis, with water. It is a mixture of several essential oils boiling between 190° and 206°. It is colourless when fresh, has the odour of thuja, is lighter than water, slightly soluble therein, but easily soluble in alcohol and ether. By oil of vitriol it is immediately resinized.

thū-jēne, s. [THUJONE.]

thū-jēn-in, s. [Eng. thujen(e); -in.]

Chem.: $C_{20}H_{32}O_{14}$. Thujigenin. Obtained by heating for a short time a mixture of thujetin and hydrochloric acid. It forms microscopic needles slightly soluble in water, but soluble in alcohol.

thū-jēt-io, a. [Eng. thujett(in); -ie.] Derived from or containing thujetin.

thujetic-acid, s.

Chem.: $C_{28}H_{42}O_{13}$. Prepared by boiling thujetin with baryta water, adding sulphuric acid after a while, then alcohol, and filtering the liquid when hot. It separates in lemon-yellow microscopic needles, soluble in alcohol and precipitated by water.

thū-jēt-in, s. [Eng. thuj(in); -ein.]

Chem.: $C_{26}H_{32}O_{16}$. A tannin-substance obtained along with a crystallizable sugar by heating thujin with dilute acids. The liquid after a time becomes colourless, and deposits thujetin on evaporation. It is soluble in alcohol and ether, and insoluble in water. Its alcoholic solution assumes a splendid blue-green colour with ammonia, and is turned inkly-black with ferric chloride.

thū-jīg-en-in, s. [THUJENIN.] thū-jīn, s. [Mod. Lat. thuj(a); -in.]

Chem.: $C_{30}H_{42}O_{12}$. A crystallizable glucoside occurring in the green parts of Thuja occidentalis. It forms lemon-yellow microscopic crystals, has an astringent taste, is soluble in alcohol, gives a yellow precipitate with acetate of lead, and is coloured dark green with ferric chloride.

thū-jōne, thū-jēne, s. [Mod. Lat. thuj(a); -one, -ene.]

Chem.: A volatile hydro-carbon obtained from thuja oil by distilling it over iodine, quicklime, and potassium, in succession. Thujone is like turpentine oil in taste and odour, is lighter than water, and boils at 165-175°.

Thū-lē, s. [Lat.] The name given by the ancients to the most northern country known to them. It is variously identified with Shetland, Iceland, and Norway.

"Where the Northern Ocean, in vast whirls, Boils round the naked melancholy isles Of furthest Thule."—Thomson: Autumn, 868.

¶ Ultima Thule: The farthest Thule: the end of the world.

thū-līte, s. [After Thule, the ancient name for a country far north; suff. -ite (Min.).]

Min.: A rose-red variety of Zoisite (q.v.), with sp.gr. 3.124, strongly dichroic parallel to the vertical axis. The original was found at Souland, Telemarke, Norway.

thūmb (b silent), *thomb, *thombe, s. [A.S. thuma, thūma; eogn. with Dut. duim; Sw. tumme; O. H. Ger. dūmo; Ger. daumen, all = a thumb; feel. thumall = the thumb of a glove. From the same root as tumid (q.v.).]

1. The short thick finger of the human hand, or the corresponding member of other animals; the first of the fingers, differing from the others in having but two phalanges.

"To identify him should have been easy: for he had a wound in the face, and had lost a thumb."—Maccutay: Hist. Eng., ch. xix.

2. The part of a glove which covers the thumb.

¶ (1) Rule of thumb: [RULE, s.]

(2) To bite the thumb at: [BITE, v.]

(3) Under one's thumb: Completely under one's power or influence; completely subservient to another.

"He is under the thumb of that doctor."—H. Kingsley: Geoffrey Hamlyn, ch. ix.

* thumb-band, s. A twist of anything as thick as the thumb.

"The thumb-bands of hay round them."—Mortimer.

thumb-bit, s. A piece of meat eaten on bread, so called from the thumb being placed on it. (Halliwel.)

O'Keefe: Fontainebleau, li. 1.

thun-bërg-i-a, s. [Named after Carl Petter Thunberg (1743-1828), a Swedish traveller, botanist, and professor of natural history at Upsal.]

Bot. : A genus of Gardenia, sometimes made a synonym of Gardenia. Involucre two-leaved; calyx about twelve-toothed; corolla campanulate; capsule beaked, two-celled. Handsome and fragrant climbers, cultivated commonly in gardens for the beauty of their flowers. Thunbergia fragrans has cordate, acuminate leaves; T. grandiflora angular, cordate leaves, larger flowers with no inner calyx, and the anthers bearded and spurred. Both are natives of the East Indies.

thun-bërg-i-ë-æ, a. pl. [Mod. Lat. thunbergia (a); Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -æ.]

Bot. : A tribe of Acanthaceæ. Seeds with a horny expansion of the placenta.

thun-dër, 'thon-der, 'thon-er, 'thun-dir, s. [Prop. thuner, from A.S. thunor = thunder, allied to thunian = (1) to become thin, to be stretched out, (2) to rattle, to thunder; gethun = a loud noise; cogn. with Dut. donder; Icel. thorr = Thor, the god of thunder; Dan. torien; Sw. torödn; O. H. Ger. thonar; Ger. donner = thunder; Lat. tono = to thunder, tonitrus = thunder; A.S. tonian, thunian = to thunder; Sans. tan = to sound. For the exercise of, cf. gender, tender, &c.]

I. Lit. & Physics : The violent report which follows a flash of lightning. It commences at the same moment as the flash; but, as the sound travels only at the rate of about 1,100 feet a second, while light does so at the rate of about 200,000 miles, the flash of the lightning is the first to be perceived, and thus a means is afforded of calculating the distance of the lightning. The noise of the thunder arises from the disturbance produced in the air by the electric discharge, but why the sound should be so prolonged has been differently explained. The old hypothesis was that the sound was echoed from every precipice, from every building, and from every cloud in the sky. Another is that the lightning itself is a series of discharges, each producing a particular sound according to the distance at which it commences, and the varying densities of the portions of air which it traverses before reaching the ear. A third conjecture is that the noise arises from the zigzag movement of the electric fluid, the air at each salient angle being at its maximum compression. (Giant.)

II. Figuratively :

1. The destructive agent in a thunderstorm; a discharge of lightning; a thunderbolt.

2. Any loud noise.

"The Grecian train
With answering thunders fill'd the echoing plain."
Pope: Homer; Iliad xlii. 1, 159.

3. An awful or startling denunciation or threat.

"The Grecian train
With answering thunders fill'd the echoing plain."
Pope: Homer; Iliad xlii. 1, 159.

3. An awful or startling denunciation or threat.

"The Grecian train
With answering thunders fill'd the echoing plain."
Pope: Homer; Iliad xlii. 1, 159.

3. An awful or startling denunciation or threat.

thunder-axe, s.

Anthrop. : A popular name for a celt, from the idea that they were "thunderbolts."

"The country folks of the West of England still hold that the thunder-axes they find fell from the sky."
Tylor: Early Hist. Mankind (ed. 1878), p. 224.

thunder-bearer, s. He in whose hands is the thunder.

"I do not bid the thunder-bearer shoot."
Shakspeare: Lear, ii. 4.

thunder-beat, v. t. To strike with a thunderbolt.

"He them thunder-bet whereas he went."
Hudson: Judith, v. 267.

thunder-bird, s.

Anthrop. : An imaginary bird, occurring in the mythology of races of low culture, and personifying thunder or its cause.

"Among the Caribs, Brazilians, Harvey Islanders and Karens, Bechoans and Basutos, we find legends of a snapping or flashing thunder-bird, which seems simply to translate into myth the thought of thunder and lightning descending from the upper regions of the air, the home of the eagle and the vulture."
Tylor: Prim. Cult. (ed. 1878), l. 363.

thunder-blasted, a. Struck or blasted by lightning.

thunder-burst, s. A burst or peal of thunder.

thunder-clap, s. A clap, peal, or burst of thunder; the sudden report of a discharge of atmospheric electricity.

"Rayne, hayle, and snowe do pay them and peanoes,
And dreadfull thunder-claps (that make them quake)
With thunders and flashing lights that thousand changes make."
Spenser: F. Q. (Of Mucabillite), vii. 23.

thunder-cloud, s.

Meteor. : A cloud from which lightning flashes forth, or may do so, with accompanying thunder. It is a modification of the nimbus, but, as a rule, is darker than the ordinary type of that cloud. When several exist the space between them is sometimes of a peculiar colour. They vary greatly in elevation, some being very low—a good many about 3,000 feet high, while others have been known to reach 16,000 feet in elevation.

"The myth... resolves itself into simple phrases, which speak of the thunder-cloud as leaning over the city from day to day."
Coz: Intro. to Mythology, p. 121.

thunder-crack, s. A clap of thunder.

"Nor is he moved with all the thunder-cracks
Of tyrants' threats, or with the surly brow Of Pow'r."
Daniel: To the Countess of Cumberland.

thunder-daisy, s.

Bot. : Chrysanthemum Leucanthemum.

thunder-dart, s. A thunderbolt.

"No worke it seem'd of earthly craftsmans wit,
But rather wrought by his owne industry,
That thunder-dartes for Jove his syre doth fit."
Spenser: Visions of Belley.

thunder-darter, s. He who darts the thunder; Jove.

"O thou great thunder-darter of Olympus, forget that thou art Jove, the king of gods."
Shakspeare: Troilus & Cressida, ii. 3.

thunder-dint, s. The noise of thunder; a thundering noise.

thunder-dirt, s. The New Zealand name for the gelatinous volva of Heodictyon, formerly eaten by the natives. (Berkeley.)

thunder-drop, s. One of the large, heavy, thinly-scattered drops of rain which precede a thunder-storm.

"As thunder-drops fall on a sleeping sea."
Tennyson: Dream of Fair Women, 122.

thunder-fish, s.

1. Malapterurus electricus. [MALAPTERURUS.]
2. Misgurnus fossilis. (Nature, March 25, 1880, p. 497.) [WEATHER-FISH.]

thunder-fit, s. A shock or noise resembling thunder.

thunder-flower, s.

Botany :

(1) Stellaria Holostea. A correspondent of Messrs. Britten & Holland suggests that the name may have arisen from the fact that the immature capsule contains air, and, when pressed between the finger and thumb, as it often is for amusement by children, it bursts with a slight report.

(2) Papaver Rhaas.

(3) Lychnis re-pertina.

thunder-god, s.

Anthrop. : A deity who, in the mythology of races of low culture, are supposed to preside over or cause thunder.

"The place of the thunder-god in polytheistic religion is similar to that of the Kato-god, in many cases even to entire coincidence. But his character is rather of wrath than of beneficence, a character which we have half lost the power to realize, since the agonizing terror of thunderstorms which appeals savage minds has dwindled away in ours, now that we behold in it not the manifestation of divine wrath, but the restoration of electric equilibrium."
Tylor: Prim. Cult. (ed. 1878), li. 262.

thunder-head, s. A popular name for the cloud called Cumulus.

thunder-master, s. Master of the thunder.

"No more, than thunder-master, shew Thy spite on mortal flesh."
Shakspeare: Cymbeline, v. 4.

thunder-music, s. Music having the deep rolling sound of thunder. (Tennyson: In Mem., lxxvii. 7.)

thunder-peal, s. A peal or clap of thunder.

"And who, 'mid thunder-peals can hear Our signals of distress."
Byron: Stanzas Composed during a Thunder-storm.

thunder-pick, s. A popular name for a Belemnite. (H. B. Woodward: Geol. Eng. & Wales, p. 261.)

thunder-plant, s.

Bot. : Sempervivum tectorum.

thunder-proof, a. Proof or secure against lightning.

thunder-rod, s. A lightning-rod (q.v.).

thunder-shoot, v. t. To strike or destroy by a thunderbolt or lightning.

"Thunder-shot and turned to ashes as Olympia."
Pulver: Holy & Profane State, v. li. 2.

thunder-shower, s. A shower which accompanies thunder.

"And through his side the last drops, ebbing slow
From the red gash, fall heavy, one by one,
Like the first of a thunder-shower."
Byron: Childe Harold, iv. 140.

thunder-splintered, a. Broken to pieces by lightning.

"Shooting abruptly from the dell
His thunder-splintered pinnacle."
Scott: Lads of the Lake, l. 11.

thunder-stone, s. A thunderbolt.

"And, thus unbraced, Cases, as yet see,
Have bared my bosom to the thunder-stone."
Shakspeare: Julius Cæsar, I. 4.

thunder-strike, v. t.

1. Lit. : To strike, blast, or injure by lightning, or as by lightning; to strike as with a thunderbolt.

"The armaments which thunder-strike the walls Of rock-built cities, hiding nations quaked."
Byron: Childe Harold, iv. 127.

2. Fig. : To astonish or strike dumb, as with something terrible. (Used only in the past participle.)

"She stood as it were thunder-stricken with amazement."
Steuart: Arctura, bk. iii.

thunder-stroke, s. A thunder-clap; a stroke or blast of lightning.

"Sæc saw, and fell to earth, as falls the oak,
At once, and blasted by the thunder-stroke."
Byron: Saul.

thunder-struck, a.

1. Lit. : Struck, blasted, or injured by lightning.

2. Fig. : Amazed; struck dumb, as by something surprising or terrible suddenly presented to the mind or view.

thunder-thump, s. A thunderbolt.

"Thou that throwest the thunder-thumps."
Googe: Light of Life, iv.

thunder-tube, s. A fulgurite (q.v.).

thun-dër, v. t. & i. [THUNDER, s.]

A. Intransitive :

I. Lit. : To make thunder; to produce the noise of thunder. (Often used impersonally; as, It thundered yesterday.)

"The Lord also thundered in the heavens, and the Highest gave his voice."
Psalm xviii. 15.

II. Figuratively :

1. To make a loud noise like thunder, particularly a loud, continued noise.

"Loud clamours shake the shore,
The horses thunder; earth and ocean roar!"
Pope: Homer; Iliad xxiv. 405.

2. To utter loud denunciations or threatenings; to cry out loudly.

"The orators on the other side thundered against sinful associations."
Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. xiii.

fâte, fât, fâre, amidst, whât, fâll, father; wê, wêt, hère, camêl, hêr, thêre; pine, pît, sîre, sir, marine; gô, pôl, or, wôre, wôlf, wôrk, whô, sôn; mûte, cûb, cûre, quite, cûr, rûle, fûll; trÿ, Sÿrian. æ, œ = ê; ey = â; qu = kw.

B. Transitive:

1. To emit as with the sound of thunder; to utter or issue by way of threat or denunciation; to denounce loudly.

"Who thunders to his captive blood and death." Shakespeare: 3 Henry VI, II. 1.

2. To lay on with violence or vehemence.

* thun'-dér-bólt, v. t. [THUNDERBOLT, a.] To strike with thunder.

"With his tongue he'll thunderbolt the world." Return from Parnassus, II. 2.

thun'-dér-bólt, s. [Eng. thunder, and bólt.]

I. Ordinary Language:

1. Lit.: A popular and erroneous term implying (as was anciently believed) that thunder somehow sends forth a destructive bolt or dart. A so-called thunderbolt is really a stream of lightning passing from one part of the heavens to the other, and especially one which reaches the earth and does damage. Lightning in certain cases can leave behind it a vitrified tube, called a Fulgurite (q.v.), which, however, is not flung or darted, but is created by vitrification on the spot where it is found. Other bodies of mineral origin have been popularly credited with being thunderbolts.

"Kings and monarchs aspire still higher, and would be gods; and yet they rest not so, unless they may have the power to flash lightnings and shoot thunderbolts, as well as Jupiter."—P. Holland: Plutarch, p. 12.

2. Figuratively:

(1) A daring or irresistible hero.

(2) A dreadful threat, denunciation, censure, or the like, proceeding from some high authority; a fulmination.

"He severely threatens such with the thunderbolt of excommunication."—Locke: On Providence.

(3) Something very dreadful, threatening, or astonishing.

"A greater wreck, a deeper fall, A shock to one—a thunderbolt to all." Byron: Mazeppa, I.

II. Technically:

1. Bot. (Pl.): (1) Lycnis vespertina; (2) Papaver Rhæas; (3) Silene inflata.

2. Her.: The thunderbolt is represented as a twisted bar in pale, inflamed at each end, arrow-mounting two jagged darts in saltire, between two wings expanded, with streams of fire issuing from the centre.

THUNDERBOLT

3. Palæont.: (BELEMNITE).

4. Petrol.: A name frequently given to the nodules of marcasite (q.v.), which are abundant in the chalk formation.

thunderbolt-stone, s. A flint. (See extract.)

"It is to be noticed that these Sioux, among their varied notions about thunder-birds and the like, give usually well a key to the great thunderbolt myth which occurs to so many lands. They consider the lightning entering the ground to scatter there in all directions thunderbolt-stones, which are flints, &c., their reason for this notion being the very natural one, that these siliceous stones actually produce a flash when struck."—Tyler: Prim. Cult. (ed 1873), II. 282.

thun'-dér-ér, s. [Eng. thunder, v.; -er.] One who thunders; specif., an epithet applied by the ancients to Jupiter, from the fact that he alone was credited with the power of hurling thunderbolts.

"For by the black infernal Styx I swear, (That dreadful oath which binds the Thunderer)." Pope: Thebais, 412.

* The Thunderer: A epithet applied to The Times newspaper (London) originally on account of a series of strong articles contributed by Mr. Edward Sterling in the early part of the nineteenth century.

thun'-dér-ýng, * thun-dre-ýng, * thun-dring, * thun-dryng, pr. par., a., & s. [THUNDER, v.]

A. As pr. par.: (See the verb).

B. As adjective:

I. Lit.: Emitting thunder.

II. Figuratively:

1. Producing or attended by a loud noise or rumbling like thunder or artillery.

"E'en fall the hand which bends the steel Around the courier's thundering heel." Scott: Norman Baron-ches, I.

2. Very great, large, or extraordinary.

"I was drawing a thundering fish out of the water."—T. Brown: Works, I. 318.

C. As subst.: The noise or report of the discharge of lightning; thunder.

"And let his voice and thunders come out of the iron."—Wieland: A postscript IV.

Thundering Legion, s.

1. A Roman legion containing some Christians, which (A.D. 174) fought under Marcus Antoninus against the Marcomanni. The Roman army was shut up in a defile and ready to perish with thirst, when a thunder-storm with heavy rain relieved them of their distress, and so terrified the enemy that a complete victory was gained. The Christians attributed the deliverance to the prayer which they had just before presented, and considered it miraculous. The heathens also considered it the interposition supernatural, but ascribed it to Jupiter, Mercury, or to the power of magic. (Dion Cassius: Roman Hist., lxi. 8; Eusebius: Eccles. Hist., v. 5.)

2. A legion composed of Christian soldiers raised in the Thebais, and led by St. Maurice.

¶ The name existed long before it was applied to either of these two legions.

thun'-dér-íng-ly, adv. [Eng. thundering; -ly.] In a thundering manner; with thunder.

* thun'-dér-íess, a. [Eng. thunder, s.; -less.] Unattended by thunder or noise.

"Thunderless lightnings striking under sea." Tennyson: To the Queen.

* thun'-dér-óus, * thun'-dre-ús, a. [Eng. thunder, s.; -ous.]

1. Producing, discharging, or emitting thunder; thundery.

"Noise and Ater, black with thunderous clouds From Sierra Leone." Milton: P. L., x., 792.

2. Making a great noise like thunder; giving a loud and deep sound; sonorous.

"Whirlwinds and thunderous storms his chariot drew." Brown: Paraphrase of Job.

3. Very loud; like thunder.

"That berg a... split in three portions with thunderous sound."—Daily Telegraph, Feb. 24, 1887.

* thun'-dér-óis-ly, adv. [Eng. thunderous; -ly.] In a thunderous manner; with thunder, or a noise like thunder.

"A veritable lion, as large as any at present existing, whose midnight roar to-day rolls thunderously in the jungle of Africa."—Daily Telegraph, March 1, 1887.

thun'-dér-storm, s. [Eng. thunder, s., and storm, s.] A storm accompanied with thunder.

¶ Thunderstorms are much more common in tropical countries where the heat is greater and the evaporation more rapid than in temperate climates, and various arctic navigators report that they become rare about 70°, and are wholly absent above 75° N. In India they are most frequent during the months of the monsoon. Everywhere they are more common in summer than in winter. As the electricity of salt water is the same as that of the atmosphere, they are less common on the sea than on the land.

thun'-dér-ý, * thun'-drý, a. [Eng. thunder, s.; -y.]

1. Having the character of, or resembling thunder.

"A cavernous thundry roaring ball." Sylvester: Du Barreaux.

2. Accompanied with thunder: as, thundry weather.

thun'-ny, s. [TUNNY.]

* thurgh, prep. [THROUGH.]

* thurgh-fare, s. [Mid. Eng. thurgh = through, and fare.] A thoroughfare.

"This world was but a thurghfare full of woo, And we be pilgrims, passing to and fro." Chaucer: C. T., 2, 369.

* thurgh-out, prep. or adv. [THROUGHOUT.]

thur'-i-ble, s. [Lat. thuribulum, turibulum, from thus, tus, genit. thuris, turis = frankincense, from Gr. θύω (thuo) = to offer sacrifice, to sacrifice; θυός (thuos) = a sacrifice, an offering.]

Eccles.: A censer, a vessel for burning incense. Thuribles of some kind must be as old as use of incense in the services of the Church; but their present form, according to Martigny, dates only from the twelfth century. The modern thurible consists of a metallic vessel or cup, sometimes of gold or silver, but more commonly of brass or latten, in which burning charcoal is placed, with a movable perforated cover. Chains are attached, so that the thurible may be waved to and fro for the readier dispersion of the a Thurifer, with thurible; b Priest, in cope, incensing the altar.

smoke of the incense which is thrown on the live charcoal. [THURIFER.]

thur'-i-fér, s. [Eccles. Lat. thuriferarius = a thurifer; from Lat. thus, genit. thuris = incense, and fero = to bear.]

Eccles.: The attendant at high mass, solemn vespers, and benediction, who uses the thurible, either by simply waving it to and fro [See cut a under Thurible], or for incensing the clergy, choir, and congregation, and at certain times presents it to the officiating priest that he may incense the altar [See cut b under Thurible] or the Host. Strictly speaking, the office of thurifer belongs to the acolyte, the highest of the four Minor Orders, but all the functions of the acolyte are now freely performed by laymen.

thú-rif-ér-ús, a. [THURIFER.] Producing or bearing frankincense.

thur'-i-fí-cá-tion, s. [Lat. thus, genit. thuris = frankincense, and facio = to make.] The act of incensing or fuming with incense; the act of burning incense.

"Some resemblance of an idolatrous thurification."—Bp. Hall: Cases of Conscience, disc. 5, case 3.

* thur'-i-fý, v. t. & i. [THURIFICATION.]

A. Trans.: To perfume with odours as from a thurible; to cense.

"Sensed and thurified in the smoke."—Nashe: Lenten Stuff.

B. Intrans.: To scatter incense; to cense.

Thy-rin'-gi-an, a. & s. [See def.]

A. As adj.: Of or pertaining to Thuringia, a region of Central Germany, which comprised parts of the Prussian province of Saxony and the Saxon duchies.

B. As subst.: A native or inhabitant of Thuringia.

thy-ríng'-ite, s. [After Thuringia, where first found; suff. -ite (Min.).]

Min.: A massive mineral stated to consist of an aggregate of minute scales. Hardness, 2.5; sp. gr., as obtained by various mineralogists, 3.151 to 3.197; lustre, dull; colour, dark pistachio-green; fracture, sub-conchoidal. Compo.: a hydrated silicate of alumina, sesquioxide and protoxide of iron, with a little magnesia. Dana (if half the water be basic) computes from the analyses the formula 1/2 (RO, HO)3 + 1/2 (Al2O3, Fe2O3)2SSiO2 + 4HO.

thÿ-ine, a. [Gr. θύϊνος (thuinós) = of or belonging to the tree thÿia.] [THUJA.] (See etym. & compound.)

thÿine-wood, s. A kind of wood (ξύλον θÿϊνον) mentioned in Rev. xviii. 12 as one of the articles in which the mystic Babylon dealt. It was mentioned also by the Greeks and Romans, the latter calling it Citrus. It was used for furniture, and for decorative purposes, and was probably Callitris quadrivalvis.

thÿ-la-gine, s. [THYLACINUS.]

Zool.: Thylacinus cynocephalus, from New Zealand, the largest predaceous marsupial now living. It is a little smaller than a wolf, dog like in form; head elongated, muzzle pointed, ears moderate, erect, triangular. Colour grayish-brown, with a series of transverse black bands on the hinder part of the back and loins; fur short and closely applied to the skin; tail of moderate length, thick at the base and tapering towards the apex, clothed with short hair. These animals are semi-plantigrade, walking partly on the toes and partly on the soles of the feet. They are very destructive to sheep, and for that reason the settlers have almost exterminated them in the more thickly populated parts of the island, but they still find shelter in the rocky gorges of the mountainous region. Called also Tiger-Wolf, Zebra-Wolf, and Tasmanian Wolf or Hyæna.

thÿ-la-ci-nús, s. (Gr. θύλακος (thylakos) = a bag, a sack, and κύων (kuôn) = a dog.)

Zool.: A genus of Dasyuridæ (in classification in which that family is sub-divided, of Dasyuridæ), with one living species, Thylacinus cynocephalus, from Tasmania, though recent fragments of bones and teeth show that an allied species formerly inhabited the mainland of Australia. The marsupial bones are represented only by small unossified fibrocartilages, and the pouch (traces of which are more obvious in the male than in other marsupials), unlike that of the kangaroos, opens backwards. The female produces four young at a birth.

thÿ-la-ci-nús, s. (Gr. θύλακος (thylakos) = a bag, a sack, and κύων (kuôn) = a dog.)

thyl-a-ōs-lē-ō, s. [Gr. θύλακος (thylakos) = a pouch, a sack, and λέων (leōn) = a lion.]

Palaeont.: An extinct genus of Marsupialia from the post-Tertiary deposits of Australia, with one species, Thylacoleo carnifex, of which nothing but the skull is known. The dentition is extremely anomalous, the functional teeth being reduced to one pair of large cutting incisors close to the median line, and one great, trenchant, compressed premolar. It was first described as a carnivorous marsupial, and named in accordance with its presumed habits "as one of the fellest and most destructive of predatory beasts"; but, as its affinities are certainly with the Phalangistidae and Macropodidae, and its dentition completely unlike that of any known predaceous animal, this view has been questioned. (Prof. Flower, in Encyc. Brit., xv. 333.)

thyl-a-ō-thēr-i-ūm, s. [Gr. θύλακος (thylakos) = a pouch, and θηρίον (thērion) = a wild beast.]

Palaeont.: Owen's name for Amphitherium (q.v.).

thyl-māl-lūs, s. [Gr. θύμαλλος (thumallos) = an unidentified fish mentioned by Ælian (N. A., xiv. 22).]

Ichthy.: A genus of Salmonidae, group Salvelini (q.v.), allied to Coregonus, from which it is principally distinguished by its rayed dorsal fin. There are five species, inhabiting clear streams of the north of Europe, Asia, and North America, of which the best known are Thymallus signifer, the Poisson bleu of the Canadian voyageurs, and T. vulgaris, the Grayling (q.v.).

thyme (th as t), *tyme, s. [Fr. thym; Prov. thime; Ital. timo; Lat. thymus (q.v.).]

Botany: 1. The genus Thymus (q.v.). 2. In composition, in the word Water-thyme (q.v.).

thyme-oil, s.

1. Chem.: A volatile oil obtained by distilling garden thyme with water. It is colourless in the fresh state, has a pleasant pungent odour and camphorous taste, sp. gr. = 87-90, sparingly soluble in water, easily in alcohol and ether, and turns the plane of polarization to the left. It contains at least two hydrocarbons: thymene, C10H16, and cymene, C10H14, and an oxygenated product, thymol, C10H14O.

2. Pharm.: It is a powerful local stimulant, which may be used in toothache if applied by lint or cotton. Mixed with olive oil or spirit and camphor, it is a stimulating liniment in chronic rheumatism, sprains, bruises, &c.

thym-oid (th as t), s. [Eng. thyme; -id.]

Chem.: C20H34O4. A product of the action of sunshine operating for several days on thymol contained in a sealed tube. It is obtained pure by mixing equal weights of thymol and thymolol in alcoholic solution, which then assumes a blood-red colour, and deposits crystals which have a greenish metallic lustre.

thym-mē-lā, s. [Gr. θυμέλη (thymelē) = a place for sacrifice. . . a platform, an orchestra.]

Greek Antiq.: An elevation, in the form of an altar, in the centre of the orchestra of a Greek theatre, on which the leader of the chorus stood.

thym-mē-lā-çé-æ, thym-mē-lē-æ (th as t), s. pl. [Mod. Lat. thymelæa; Lat. fem. pl. ad. suff. -æceæ.]

Bot.: Daphnads; an order of Perigynous Exogens, alliance Daphnales. Stem shrubby, rarely herbaceous, with a tenacious bark. Leaves exstipulate, entire. Flowers capitate or spiked, terminal, or axillary, often crowded in an involucre. Calyx tubular, coloured, the limb four- or five-cleft; corolla wanting, or reduced to scale-like petals on the orifice of the calyx. Stamens eight, four, or two; style one; stigma undivided; ovary one-celled, with a single pendulous ovule; fruit hard, dry, nut-like or drupaceous. Found in South America, the Cape of Good Hope, and in Europe. The bark is caustic. Known genera thirty-eight; species 300. [HEBANTHACEÆ.]

thym-mē-lā-çé-ōūs (or ceous as shūs, th as t), a. [THYMELACEÆ.]

Bot.: Belonging or relating to, or like the Thymelacæe.

*thym-mō-læ'-a (th as t), s. [THYMELEÆ.]

Bot.: The typical genus of Thymelacæe (q.v.). Now made a synonym of Daphne (q.v.).

thym-mō-lē'-s, s. [Gr. θυμέλη (thymelē) = a place of sacrifice, an altar, a temple; θύω (thūō) = to sacrifice.]

Entom.: A genus of Hesperidae. Antennæ short, not terminating in a hook; hinder margin of the fore wings rounded; wings dark, with chequered spots, fringes chequered. There is one British species, Thymele alveolaris; blackish, tinged with green, and chequered with creamy-white spots. The larva feeds on the raspberry. Found in moist places. (Stainton.) Other species are from tropical America, &c.

thym-mō-lē'-ic, a. [Eng. thymel(a); -ic.] Of or belonging to a thymela (q.v.).

"There was another entrance to the thymelic platform."—Donaldson: Theatre of the Greeks, p. 222.

thym-ō-ne (th as t), a. [Mod. Lat. thym(ua); -ene.]

Chem.: C10H16. A hydrocarbon belonging to the camphene group, constituting the most volatile portion of oil of garden thyme. By repeated distillation it is obtained as a colourless oil, having an agreeable odour of thyme, sp. gr. = 868 at 20°, boiling at 160-165°, and deflecting the plane of polarization to the left.

thym-mī-a-tēch-ny' (th as t), s. [Gr. θυμίαμα (thumiama) = incense, and τέχνη (technē) = art.]

Med.: The art of employing perfumes in medicine. (Dunghison.)

thym-yc (th as t), a. [Lat. thym(us); Eng. suff. -ic.]

Anat.: Of or belonging to the thymus gland: as, the thymic vein.

thym-mīç'-ic (th as t), a. [Formed from Eng. thymol (q.v.).] Derived from or containing thymol.

thymiclo-acid, s. [THYMICLO-ACID.]

thym-mō-il (th as t), s. [Eng. thymo(l); -il.]

Chem.: C12H18O2. Obtained by distilling thymol in presence of sulphuric acid and manganese peroxide. It comes over as a yellow oil, which may be purified by crystallization from ether-alcohol. It forms reddish-yellow four-sided shining lamina, having an aromatic odour. It is heavier than water, only sparingly soluble in alcohol, easily in ether, melts at 43°, and boils at about 235°.

thym-mō-ll'-a-mide (th as t), s. [Eng. thymol, and amide.]

Chem.: C12H15(NH2)O. Formed by the action of dry ammonia gas on fused thymol. It is obtained as a dark red uncrystallizable mass, hard and brittle, but softens at 100°, so that it may be drawn into threads. Is soluble in alcohol.

thym-mō-ll'-ic (th as t), a. [Eng. thymol; -ic.] Contained in or derived from thymol (q.v.).

thymollic-acid, s.

Chem.: C24H32O19. The product of the oxidation of thymol by the action of the air in presence of potash. The potassium salt of the acid which is formed is exhausted with alcohol and decomposed with hydrochloric acid. The acid is then obtained in dingy yellow uncrystallizable flocks sparingly soluble in water.

thym-mō-ll-ōl (th as t), s. [Eng. thymol; -ol.]

Chem.: C12H15O2. A substance obtained by exposing thymol contained in a sealed tube to the action of sunshine for a period of several days. Recrystallized from alcohol, it is obtained in small, four-sided prisms, which are inodorous and tasteless, dissolve sparingly in water, easily in alcohol and ether, melt at 145°, and distil without decomposition at 290°.

thym-ōl (th as t), s. [Mod. Lat. thym(us); -ol.]

Chem.: C10H15HO. Thymylic hydrate, thymylic alcohol, thymylic acid, thymic acid. The oxygenated constituent of thyme-oil and a homologue of pinol, obtained from thyme oil by fractional distillation, passing over chiefly between 225° and 235°. Purified by recrystallization from alcohol, it is obtained in transparent rhomboidal plates. It has a mild odour and aromatic taste, a specific gravity = 1.0235 in the solid state, and does not act on polarized light, melts at 44°, and boils at about 230°. It is almost insoluble in water, soluble in alcohol, ether, and strong acetic acid, and forms several substitution derivatives by the action of bromine or chlorine in the presence of sunshine. Thymol is an antiseptic and disinfectant, and is largely employed in the Listerian system.

thym-mōt'-ic (th as t), a. [From Eng. thymol (q.v.).] Derived from or containing thymol.

thymotic-acid, s.

Chem.: C11H14O3 = C10H14O.CO2. Thymyl-carbonic acid. Prepared by heating thymol with sodium in a flask through which a stream of carbonic anhydride is passed, thymyl carbonate and thymolate of sodium being formed. From the latter, hydrochloric acid throws down thymotic acid in colourless flocks. It is purified by distillation with water, and is obtained as a white, loosely-coherent, crystalline mass with silky lustre. It is nearly insoluble in cold water, melts at 120°, dissolves in ferric chloride with fine blue colour, the same colour being immediately produced in the neutral solutions.

thym-ō-tide (th as t), s. [Eng. thymo(l); -ide.]

Chem.: C11H12O2. Produced by the action of pentachloride of phosphorus on thymotic acid. It crystallizes from alcohol in white microscopic needles, which melt at 187°.

thym-mūs (th as t), s. [Mod. Lat., from Lat. thymus, thymum; Gr. θυμός, θυμῶν (thumos, thumon) = thyme, from θύω (thūō) = to sacrifice, either from its fragrance or because it was burnt on altars.]

Bot.: Thyme; a genus of Origanide (q.v.). Small, often hoary, much-branched, highly-aromatic shrubs. Leaves small, entire, often with revolute margins; flowers whorled or capitate; calyx with ten to thirteen ribs, tubular, two-lipped, the upper lip three-toothed, the lower one blunt, the throat hairy; corolla with the upper lip erect, the stamens diverging, anther cells at first nearly parallel, afterwards diverging; the connective, sub-triangular, small nuts nearly smooth. Known species forty, from the temperate parts of the Eastern Hemisphere. No American species. Thymus Serpyllium, the Wild-thyme, is prostrate, with oblong or ovate, entire, obtuse, petiolate leaves, more or less ciliated at the base; floral leaves similar; flowers purple. The Lemon or Lemon-scented thyme (T. citriodorus) is a variety of T. Serpyllium, cultivated in gardens for its agreeable smell. T. Chamaedrys, formerly regarded as distinct, is now placed under it as a sub-species. It is used in India in disease of the eyes and stomach, and on the Chenab as a vermifuge. T. vulgaris is Garden Thyme. It is a small much-branched shrub, a native of the southern countries of Europe, from Portugal to Greece. It is a pungent aromatic, much used in cookery.

thymus-gland, s.

Anat.: An elongated, glandular-like body, with two lobes which touch each other, situated partly in the thorax, partly in the lower region of the neck. It reaches its greatest size at about the second year of life, then ceases to grow, and finally dwindles into a mere vestige. It is supposed to be in some way connected with the elaboration of the blood in infancy. Its name refers to its resemblance to the flowers of thyme.

thym-y' (th as t), a. [Eng. thym(e); -y.] Of the nature of or abounding with thyme; hence, fragrant.

"Thymy slope and woody covert, Where the cuckoo hyned the May." Blackie: Lays of Highland & Islands, p. 7.

thym-yīl (th as t), s. [Eng. thym(ol); -yl.]

Chem.: C10H13. The radical of thymol and its derivatives.

thymyl sulphurio-acid, s.

Chem.: C10H14HSO4. Sulphothymic acid. Formed by the action of oil of vitriol on thymol. Its aqueous solution evaporated in a vacuum crystallizes in translucent pearly tables or prisms, which are very soluble in bōil, bōy; pōut, jōwl; oat, çell, chorus, çhīn, bench; go, çem; thin, this; sin, aç; expect, Xenophon, exist. ph = l -clan, -tian = shan. -tion, -sion = shūn; -tion, -sion = zhūn. -clous, -tious, -sious = shūs. -ble, -dle, &c. = bcl, dcl.

water. With bases it forms a series of crystalline compounds.

thÿ-mÿl'-ic (th as t), a. [Eng. thymyl; -ic.] Contained in or derived from thymol (q.v.).

thymlic-acid, alcohol, or hydrate, s. [HYMOL.]

thÿn-niôh'-thÿs, s. (Gr. θύννος (thunnos) = a tunny (q.v.), and ἰχθύς (ichthys) = a fish.)

Ichthy. & Palæont.: A genus of Cyprinidae, group Cyprinina, with three species, from the East India. Specimens have been found in the Miocene.

thÿn-ni-dæ, s. pl. [Mod. Lat. thynnus]; 2; Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -idae.]

Entom.: An old family of Fossorial Hymenoptera, now merged in Sapygidae.

thÿn-nÿs, s. [Lat., from Gr. θύννος (thunnos) = the tunny (q.v.), from θύνω (thunō) = to rush fast, to dart along.]

1. Ichthy. & Palæont.: A genus of Scombridae, with several species, ranging over tropical and temperate seas. First dorsal continuous, spines feeble; from six to nine finlets behind the dorsal and anal; scales of pectoral crowded, forming a corselet; a longitudinal keel on each side of the tail. Several species, abundant in the Mediterranean and in all warm seas, and occasional visitors to our shores. Thynnus or Orcynus thynnus, the Tunny, is a fish of ten feet or more in length. Not uncommon in Eocene and Miocene formations.

2. Entom.: A genus of Thynnidae (q.v.).

thÿr-ê-ô (yr as ir), pref. [Thyrso-.]

thÿr-ê-ôp-tër-i-næ (yr as ir), s. pl. [Pref. thÿreo-; Gr. ἄρπυγίον (arpygion) = a feather, a wing, and Lat. fem. pl. adj. suff. -inæ.]

Entom.: A sub-family of Truncatipennæ (q.v.). They seek their prey upon or under the bark of trees where small insects abound.

thÿr-ô, (yr as ir), pref. [Gr. θυρεός (thureos) = a door-stone, a large, oblong shield, shaped like a door; θυρα (thura) = a door.] Shaped like a door; oblong.

thyro-hyals, s. pl. Anat.: The great cornua of the hyoid bone. They project backwards from its sides and end in rounded extremities.

thyro-hyoid, a. Anat.: Of or belonging to the hyoid bone and the thyroid axis.

Thyro-hyoid arch: Embryol.: The third of the branchial arches, or pharyngeal plates. It is related to the formation of the lower or great cornua and the body of the hyoid bone, and corresponds with the first true branchial arch of amphibia and fishes.

thÿr-ôid, thÿr-ê-ôid (yr as ir), a. [Pref. thÿro-, thÿreo-, and Gr. εἶδος (eidos) = form.]

Anat.: Of an oblong form; shaped like an oblong shield.

thyroid-body, s. Anat.: A soft, reddish and highly-vascular organ, consisting of two lateral lobes united by their lower ends by a transverse portion called the isthmus. It forms a rounded projection upon the trachea and the larynx. It is one of the vascular glands, or glands without ducts. Its function is unknown.

thyroid-cartilages, s. pl. Anat.: Two flat lateral plates, continuous in front, forming a narrow angle like the letter V. In the male it is called Adam's apple.

thyroid-gland, s. [THYROID-BODY.]

thÿ-rôid-ê-pl, a. [Eng. thyroid; -eal.] Pertaining or relating to the thyroid gland or cartilage.

thÿ-rôp-tër-a, s. [Gr. θυρα (thura) = a door, and πτερόν (pteron) = a wing.]

Zool.: A genus of Vespertilionidae (q.v.), forming a separate group of that family (Dobson: Catal. Chir., p. 553). Muzzle elongated, slender; crown cone considerably elevated above the forehead; nasal apertures circular; ears funnel-shaped; bases of the thumbs and soles of the feet with highly specialized organs in the shape of hollow auricular discs. There is but one species, Thyroptera tricolor, from Brazil. It is a small bat, with moderately long, dense fur, reddish-brown above and below, except breast and abdomen, which are pale yellowish white.

thÿr-sa-cân-thÿs, s. a. [Lat. thÿrs(us), and acanthus (q.v.).]

Bot.: A genus of Gendaruseæ. Tropical American shrubs or herbs, with large leaves and a long raceme of fascicled or cymose flowers.

thÿrse, s. [THYRSUS.]

thÿrse-flower, s. Bot.: The genus Thyracanthus (q.v.)

thÿrs'-i-form, a. [Lat. thÿrsus and forma = form.]

Bot.: Resembling a thyrus.

thÿr'-sî-tôg, s. [THYRSUS.]

Ichthy.: A genus of Trichuridae (q.v.), with several species from tropical and sub-tropical seas. Body rather elongate, for the most part naked; first dorsal continuous, the spines arc of moderate length, and extend on to the second; from two to six finlets behind the dorsal and anal; several strong teeth in jaws, and teeth on palatine bones. The species attain a length of from four to five feet, and are esteemed as food fishes.

thÿr'-sôid, thÿr-sôid-al, a. [Gr. θυρσος (thursos) = a thyrus, and εἶδος (eidos) = form, appearance.]

Bot.: Having somewhat the form of a thyrus.

thÿr-sa-la, s. a. [Mod. Lat., dimin. from Lat. thÿrsus (q.v.).]

Bot.: A kind of inflorescence consisting of a small cyme in the axil of a leaf. Occurs in the Labiatae.

thÿr'-sÿs (pl. thÿr'-sÿi), thÿrse, s. [Lat., from Gr. θυρσος (thursos) = a light, straight shaft, a stalk.]

1. Class. Antig.: One of the most common attributes of Bacchus or emblems of Bacchus and his followers. It consisted often of a spear or staff wrapped with ivy and vine branches, or of a lance having the iron part thrust into a pine cone. In ancient representations it appeared in various forms. Thyrsi were carried by the Bacchantes in their hands, when celebrating the orgies of Bacchus.

"Round about him, fair Bacchantes, Bearing cymbals, flutes, and thÿrse."

2. Bot.: A kind of inflorescence consisting of a panicle, the principal diameter of which is in the middle between the base and the apex; a compact panicle, the lower branches of which are shorter than those in the middle. It is at first centripetal and afterwards centrifugal. Example, the Lilac.

thÿ-sâ-nî-a, s. [Gr. θÿσανος (thusanos) = fringe.]

Entom.: Part of the old genus Noctua = the Erebus of Latreille.

thÿ-sa-nôp-tër, s. [THYSANOPTERA.] Any individual of the Thysanoptera (q.v.).

thÿ-sa-nôp-tër-a, s. pl. [Mod. Lat., from Gr. θÿσανος (thusanos) = a fringe, and πτερόν (pteron) = a wing.]

Entom.: Halliday's name for the group more generally known as Physopoda (q.v.).

thÿ-sa-nÿr-a, s. pl. [Gr. θÿσανος (thusanos) = fringe, and οὐρα (oura) = a tail.]

1. Entomology: (1) An order of Insecta founded by Latreille, embracing Thysanura Genuina (2) and Collembola (q.v.).

(2) According to Lubbock, an order of Insecta, while other authors make them a tribe of a larger order [(1)]. Antennæ long, many jointed, tarsi from two to four joints, mandibles and maxilla more or less exposed maxillary palpi often long; labium more or less cleft in front; prothorax large; some of the abdominal segments bear pairs of appendages, and there are generally two or three caudal bristles. [COLLEMBOLA.]

2. Palæont.: Their remains are often found in amber, which is of Post-Tertiary date.

thÿ-sa-nÿr'-i-form, a. [Mod. Lat. thÿsanura, and Lat. forma = form.]

Entom.: Of or belonging to, or resembling the Thysanura (q.v.). Used by Swainson of a certain type of caterpillars, having the head armed with distinct spines, forming a crest round its hinder part, or divided into two hornlike points; the extremity of the body also terminating in two pointed processes. Examples, the larvae of the large Nymphalidae of Tropical America, Hipparchia, &c.

thÿ-sêlf, thi-self, thy-selfe, pron. [Eng. thy, and self.] A reflexive pronoun used after thou (expressed or understood), to mark distinction with emphasis.

"These are thy glorious works, Parent of good, Al mighty, thine this universal frame, Thus wondrous fair; thyself how wondrous then!" Milton: P. L., v. 164.

ti, s. [Native name.]

Botany:

1. Cordyline Ti, formerly Draecena terminalis, a small liliaceous tree about twelve feet high, a native of the islands of the Pacific. Its great woody roots when baked become sweet and nutritious. When boiled it furnishes a syrup used as a substitute for sugar. When the roots are bruised, mixed with water, and fermented, they form an intoxicating beverage, and when distilled, an ardent spirit. The stems are used for fences, and the leaves as thatch for houses. They are also eaten by cattle, sheep, and goats. [CALODRACON.]

2. Cordyline australis and C. indivisa. (New Zealand.)

ti-ar, s. [Fr. tiare, from Lat. tiara.] A tiara.

"Of beaming sunny rays, a golden tiar, Circled his head." Milton: P. L., lll. 622.

ti-âr-a, ti-a'-ra, s. [Lat., from Gr. τιάρα, τιάρας (tiara, tiaras) = the Persian head-dress worn on great occasions. Skeat suggests a derivation from Pers. tāhar = a crown, a diadem.]

1. The head-covering of the ancient Persians; the crown of the ancient Persian kings. These alone had the privilege of wearing the tiara erect; the nobility and priests wore it depressed, or turned down on the fore side. Its form is described variously by different authors, so that it must have varied at different periods. According to Xenophon it was encompassed with the diadem, at least on ceremonial occasions.

2. The triple crown worn by the Pope on certain occasions as a sign of his temporal power, of which it is a badge, as the keys are of his spiritual jurisdiction. The whole history of the Papal Tiara is uncertain. Nicholas I. (858-67) is said to have been the first to unite the princely crown with the mure though the Bollandists think this was done before his time. The common statement that Boniface VIII. (about 1300) added the second is incorrect, for Hefele (Bekträge, ii. 286 sqq.) shows that Innocent III. is represented wearing the second crown in a painting older than the time of Boniface. Urban V. (1369-70) is supposed to have added the third crown. In its present form the tiara consists of a high cap of cloth of gold, encircled by three coronets, and surmounted by a mound and cross of gold; on each side a pendant, embroidered and fringed at the end, and semé of crosses of gold. The tiara is placed on the Pope's head at his coronation by the second cardinal deacon in the loggia of St. Peter's, with the words: "Receive the tiara adorned with three crowns, and know that thou art Father of princes and kings, Ruler of the World, and Vicar of our Saviour Jesus Christ."

3. Hence, figuratively used for the papal dignity.

4. A crown, a diadem.
"This royal robe, and this tiara, wore "Old Priam, and this golden sceptre bore," Dryden: Virgil: Æneid vii. 337.

ti-är-aed, ti-är-aed, a. [Eng. tiara; -ed.] Adorned with or wearing a tiara.

ti-ä-rid'-y-üm, s. [Mod. Lat. dimin., from tiara (q.v.).]

Bot.: A genus of Heliotropææ, akin to Heliotropium, but having the tube of the corolla angular, and two-celled, mitre-shaped ones. Tiaridium indicum is an astringent, and is used to cleanse ulcers or allay inflammation.

ti-är'-is, s. [Gr. τίaris (tiaris), another form of τίαρα (tiara).] [TIARA.]

1. Ornith.: A genus of Fringillidæ with one species, from Brazil. Bill conical, entire; head crested; wings moderate; tail even or slightly rounded; feet moderate.

2. Zool.: A genus of Agamidæ, with three species, from the islands of the Eastern Peninsula. Scales of the body keeled, those of the back unequal; eyebrow and parotids unnermed.

tib, s. [A contract, or corrupt, of the proper name Tavitha.]

1. A low woman, a paramour, a prostitute.

"Every coltrel
That comes inquiring for his tib," Shakspear: Pericles, iv. 4.

2. The ace of trumps in the game of gleek.
"(1) St. Tib's Eve: An expression equivalent to the "Greek Calends"; never. Brewer says that St. Tib's is a corrupted form of St. Ubes, itself a corruption of Setubal. There is no St. Ubes in the calendar.
(2) Tib of the buttery: A goose. (Gypsy cant).
(3) To tib out: To go out of bounds. (School slang).

"When I was a boy I used what they call to tib out, and ran down to a public-house in Cistercian Lane, the Red Cow, str."—Thackeray: Newcomes, ch. xlii.

tib-cat, s. A female cat.

tib-ért, *týb-ért, s. [Tib.] An old name for a cat.

Ti-bét, Thi-bét (Th as T), s. [See def.]

Geog.: A region of Central Asia immediately north of the Himalaya Mountains. It is about 1,400 miles from east to west, and 600 from north to south, and is subject to China.

Tibet-cloth, s.

1. A camelid or fabric made of goat's hair.
2. A fine woollen cloth used for ladies' dresses.

Tibet-dog, Tibet-mastiff, s.

Zool.: A variety of Canis familiaris, about the size of a Newfoundland dog, but with a head resembling that of the mastiff, and having the flews large and pendent. The colour is usually deep black, with a bright brown spot over each eye; the hair is long, and the tail bushy and well curled. This variety is extremely savage, and has been known from classic times, and has been employed in the games of the circus.

Ti-bét-an, Thi-bét-an (Th as T), a, & v. [See def.]

A. As adj.: Of or pertaining to Tibet or Thibet.

B. As substantive:

1. A native or inhabitant of Tibet.
2. The language of Tibet.

Tibetan sun-bear, s.
Zool.: Ursus tibetanus. [SUN-BEAR, 1.]

Tibetan water-shrew, s.
Zool.: Nectogale elegans. It is about eight inches long, half of which is occupied by the tail; upper surface slate-gray, lower parts white. It has largely webbed feet, and is the most thoroughly aquatic of all the Soricidæ. [NECTOGALÆ.]

tib'-i-ä, s. [Lat.= a pipe, the shin-bone.]

1. Anat.: The shin-bone, with the exception of the femur, the longest bone in the skeleton. It is the anterior and inner of the two bones of the leg, and alone communicates the weight of the trunk to the foot. It is slightly twisted, and articulates with the femur, fibula, and astragalus. Its superior extremity is thick and expanded, with two condylar surfaces supporting the femur, and an external and an internal tubercle; the shaft is three-sided, the inner surface convex and subcutaneous; the inferior is smaller than the superior extremity, and forms a thick process called the internal malleolus. (Quain.) The tibia corresponds with the radius of the arm.

2. Entom.: The fourth joint of the leg.

3. Music: A kind of pipe, a common musical instrument among the Greeks and Romans. It had holes at proper intervals, and was furnished with a mouth-piece, the performer in blowing putting the end of it in his mouth. Two such pipes were often blown simultaneously by the same performer.

"Cross-flutes were known to the Greeks by the name psaltria (ψαλτρία), and to the Romans as tibia solida, both of these terms leave no doubt as to their nature. By the Romans the cross-flute was sometimes called also tibia mæca, the meaning of which is very doubtful. Although the tibia represented flutes of all kinds, yet if a real tibia or shin-bone be made into a flute, it is held crossways, and the player blows into a hole in the side."—Stainer & Barrett: Dict. Musical Terms.

tib'-i-äl, a. [Lat. tibi(a); Eng. adj. suff. -al.]

1. Pertaining to the pipe or flute called a tibia.
2. Pertaining to the tibia or shin-bone; as, the tibia artery.

ti-big'-in-äte, v. t. [Lat. tibicen, genit. tibicinis= a flute-player.] To play on a tibia or pipe.

tib'-i-ö, prof. [TIBIA.] Connected with the tibia.

tibio-fibular, a. Of, belonging to, or connected with the tibia and the fibula. There are tibia-fibular articulations.

tibio-tarsal, a.
Anat.: Of or belonging to the tibia and the tarsus. (Dunglison.)

tic, s. [Fr. = a bad habit, a convulsive movement.]

Pathol.: Neuralgia.

tic dolo-reux, s.
Pathol.: Brow-ague, or prosopalgia, a common form of neuralgia, involving the fifth or trigeminal nerve, usually in its ophthalmic branch. A variety is termed clavus hystericus, from the feeling as of a nail being driven into the parts.

ti-cal', a. [Native name.]

1. A Siamese coin, worth about 2s. 6d. sterling; also a weight equal to about 2.6 grains Troy.
2. A Chinese money of account of the value of about 6s. 8d. sterling; also a weight equal to about 4½ ounces.

tice, *tise, v. t. [A contract. of enticer (q.v.).] To entice, to seduce, to allure.

"What strong enchantments tice my weary soul?"
Martine: I Tamburlaine 1. 2.

tice-mént, s. [A contract. of enticement (q.v.).] The act of enticing; enticement, allurement.

ti-chöd-rö-mä, s. [Gr. τεῖχος (teichos) = a wall, and δρομεύς (dromeus) = a runner.]

Ornith.: Wall-creeper (q.v.); a genus of Cestridæ, with one species, ranging from South Europe to Abyssinia, Nepal, and the north of China. Bill slightly curved, nostrils with membranous seals. Wings long and rounded; tail rounded, tip of feathers soft.

ti'-chö-rhine, a. [Mod. Lat. tichorhinus, from Gr. τεῖχος (teichos) = a wall, and ῥίς (rhis), genit. ῥίνος (rhinos) = the nose.]

Paleont.: The English translation of the specific name of the Woolly Rhinoceros (R. tichorhinus), which has reference to the fact that the nostrils are completely separated by a bony septum. [WOOLLY-RHINOCEROS.]

tick (1), s. [A contract. of ticket (q.v.).]

1. Credit, trust.

"Play on tick, and lose the Indies, I'll discharge it all to-morrow."—Dryden: Evening's Love, li.

2. A score, an account.

"Paying ready money that the maids might not run tick at the market."—Arbutnot: Joan Bull.

tick (2), *teke (1), *tikka, *tique, *tyke, s. [O. Dut. teke; Low Ger. teke, tyke; Ger. sticke, zecke; Ital. tecca; Dut. teek. From the same root as TAKE (q.v.).]

1. A popular name for any individual of the family Ixodidæ (q.v.). They abound in almost all parts of the world, but chiefly in warm countries. Many of them live in woods, on the branches of trees, but ready to attach themselves to animals, which sometimes suffer greatly from their attacks. The quantity of blood drawn from their hosts by these little pests is by no means so inconsiderable as one might imagine from their original size, for their skin is an distensible that the gorged parasite increases to many times its original bulk. Although generally confined to some particular species or group of animals, ticks occasionally attack man. (See extract.)

"Deleorgue speaks of some very small, reddish ticks in Africa, which cover the clothes by thousands, and produce distressing itching. Others are found in different parts of the globe, and twenty-four species have been described."—Van Beneden: Animal Parasites, p. 114.

2. Dot.: The same as TICK-BEAN (q.v.).

"There are several varieties of the tick-bean in cultivation, locally known under the following names: Harrow tick, flat tick, Essex tick, and French tick."—Morton: Cyclopedia Agriculture.

tick-bean, s.

Bot.: A variety of the common bean, Faba vulgaris, smaller in size. It is used for feeding horses and other animals.

tick-eater, s.

Ornith.: Any individual of the genus Crotophaga (q.v.).

tick-seed, s.

Bot.: A name common to plants of the genera Coreopsis and Corispermum.

tick (3), *teke (2), *ticke, a. [Low Lat. techa; Lat. techa = a case, from Gr. θήκη (thêkê) = a case to put anything into, from same root as τήθημι (tithêmi) = to place; Dut. tijk; O. H. Ger. zeiche.]

1. The cover or case for holding the filling of mattresses and beds.

2. Ticking (q.v.).

"Like as, for quilts, ticks, and mattresses, the flux of the Cadured in France had no fellow."—P. Holland: Plinie, bk. xix., ch. 1.

tick (4), s. [Tick (2), v.] A small, distinct noise, such as that of a going watch or clock.

"The leisurely and constant tick of the death-watch."—Ray: Remains, p. 224.

tick-tick, adv. & s.

A. As adv.: With a sound resembling the tick or beat of a watch or clock.

B. As subst.: A tick; a sound made like that by a watch or clock.

tick (5), *tek, s. [Dut. tik = a touch, a pat, a tick; tikken = to pat, to tick; Low Ger. tük = a light touch with the tip of the finger. A weakened form from the same root as TAKE (q.v.).]

* 1. A slight touch; a tip.

"Tek or lytliche towche. Tactulus."—Prompt. Parv.

2. A small mark intended to direct attention to something, or to act as a check.

"To put a tick against the candidate he prefers."—Daily News, Sept. 25, 1855.

3. A game of boys; also called Tig.

"By moonshine, many a night, doggie each other chase, At hood-wink, barley-break, at tick, or prison base."—Drayton: Poly-Oblion, s. 30.

tide, *tyde, s. [A.S. tid = time, hour; cogn. with Dut. tijd; Icel. tidh; Dan. & Sw. tid; O. H. Ger. zú; Ger. zeit; Dut. tij = tide.]

I. Ordinary Language:

*1. Time, season, hour.
"He hath than at all tide Of love such manner pride." Gower: C. A., l.

*2. The alternate rise and fall of the water in the ocean, as seen on sea beaches, cliffs, estuaries, &c. When the water rises to the highest point it is capable of reaching on any particular day it is called high tide; when it sinks to the lowest possible ebb, low tide is reached. High tides follow each other at intervals of twelve hours twenty-five minutes, low tides succeed each other at the same interval. The most potent cause in producing the tides is the action of the moon. It is obvious that by the laws of gravitation the moon must attract the water of the ocean on the particular side on which it is itself at the time, and if the earth were immovably fixed, and there were no sun, this would be all. But the earth is not fixed, and in addition to drawing the water to it from the earth on one side of the globe, the moon draws the globe itself away from the water on the other side, thus making high water at the same time on opposite sides of the earth. The sun also exerts an attraction, but owing to his enormous distance it is feeble than that of the moon. When the sun and moon exert their influence in one direction it is the highest tide, called a spring tide; when they counteract each other's attraction it is neap tide. Though to an observer on the land the water seems simply to alternately rise and fall, yet what really take place on the ocean at large is that the moon raises a wave, which follows her movement, thus producing high water successively at different places as the earth turns upon its axis: if the earth did not revolve, tides would only occur every fourteen days. The energy producing tides is thus mainly that of the earth, not of the moon; the store of earthly energy is therefore reduced by the tides, which act as a break or drag upon the revolving globe, while the energy of the moon is increased by them. The effect is to retard the rotation of the earth and cause the moon slowly to increase her distance from the earth. Tides reaching the shore are affected by its conformation. Thus in a nearly land-locked sea like the Mediterranean they are only from one to three feet. Far out in the ocean they have but a small range: thus at St. Helena they are only three feet, while in London they are eighteen or nineteen feet. The most remarkable tides in the British Islands are in the Bristol Channel. At Cardiff there is a rise and fall during spring tides of thirty-seven or thirty-eight feet, and during neap tides of twenty-eight or twenty-nine feet; the greatest tide, that in the Bay of Fundy, is fifty feet.

*3. A state of being at the height or in superabundance.

"I have important business
The tide whereof is now."
Shaksp.: Troilus & Cressida, v. 1.

*4. A flood, a rush, a torrent.
"The tide of knives"
Shaksp.: Timon of Athens, III. 4.

*5. A stream, a flow, a current: as, a tide of blood.

*6. Course or tendency of causes, influences, or circumstances; regular course or process; natural tendency; course, current; sometimes a favourable conjunction of causes or influences.

"There is a tide in the affairs of men Which, taken at its flood, leads on to fortune."
Shaksp.: Julius Cæsar, IV. 3.

*7. A violent commotion.
"The tides of people once up, there want not stirring winds to make them more rough."
Bacon: Henry VII.

—Macaulay: Hist. Eng., ch. lii.

tidal-water, s. Water affected by the ebb and flow of the tide.

tidal-wave, tidal-wave, s.

Physical Geog.: The wave formed by the union of two waves, one produced by the attraction of the sun, the other by that of the moon. The ocean tide-wave is called the primitive, and that of bays, estuaries, &c., the derivative tide wave. The tide wave which produces high water at the several ports of Great Britain, comes from the Atlantic. A small portion of it passes up the English Channel, through the Straits of Dover, and turns northward, whilst the main portion, moving more rapidly in an open sea, washes the western coast of Britain, and, passing the Orkneys, turns south between Scotland and Norway, sweeping with great velocity along the eastern coast of the former country. [BORE, 2., s.] tidal-way, s. The channel in which the tide sets.

"In addition to the many chances from the race being swum in a tidal-way."
—Field, Aug. 27, 1857.

His boots were polished, his jacket was trim."
— Barham: Ingoldsby Legends; The Execution.

(4) A kind of growl or screech after cheering; as, three cheers and a tiger. (Amer. Colloq.)

II. Technically:

1. Zool.: Felis tigris (* Tigris regalis, Gray), the largest and most dangerous of the Felidae, exceeding the Lion slightly in size and far surpassing him in destructiveness. It is purely Asiatic in its habitat, but is not by any means confined to the hot plains of India, though there it reaches its highest development both of size and coloration. It is found in the Himalayas at certain seasons, at a high altitude, and in 1887 one was captured near Wladivostok, in Siberia, and another in the Caucasus, near the Black Sea. (Nature, Nov. 10, 1887.) It is met with in the eastward throughout Chinese Tartary, as far north, it is said, as the island of Saghalien, where the winter is very severe. According to Fayer (Royal Tiger of Bengal, p. 30), the full-grown male Indian tiger is from nine feet from the nose to the tip of the tail, and from thirty-six to forty-two inches high at the shoulder. It is the only member of the family ornamented with cross stripes on the body—a scarce type of coloration among mammals. These cross stripes help to render the animal inconspicuous among the reeds in which it commonly hides itself, and where it would be seen with comparative ease if marked with spots or longitudinal bands. The ground colour of the skin is rufous or tawny yellow, shaded with white on the ventral surface. This is varied with vertical black stripes or elongated ovals and brindlings. On the face and posterior surface of the ears the white markings are peculiarly well developed. The depth of the ground colour and the intensity of the black markings vary, according to the age and condition of the animal. In old tigers the ground becomes more tawny, of a lighter shade, and the black markings better defined. The ground colouring is more dusky in young animals. Although possessed of immense strength and ferocity, the tiger rarely attacks an armed man, unless provoked, though often carrying off women and children.

When pressed by hunger or enfeebled by age and incapable of dealing with larger prey, like buffaloes, the tiger prowls round villages, and, having once tasted human flesh, becomes a confirmed man-eater (q.v.). In a Government report it is stated that "one tigress caused the desertion of thirteen villages, and 250 square miles of country were thrown out of cultivation." The natives destroy tigers by traps, pitfalls, spring-guns, and poisoned arrows, but the orthodox method of keeping down their numbers as pursued by Europeans is to employ natives to beat the bush while the game, when started, is shot by the sportsmen seated on elephants. The sport is exciting, but dangerous; for a wounded tiger has been known to spring upon an elephant and to inflict serious wounds on the driver and occupants of the howdah, before it could be despatched. When taken young the Tiger is capable of being tamed. The pair of adult animals which were presented to the Zoological Society of London by the Guicowar of Baroda, used to be led about by their attendants in the streets of that city; and Sir James Outram once possessed a male which lived at large in his quarters, and occasionally accompanied him in boat excursions. The Tiger was known to the ancients; frequent mention of it occurs in both Greek and Latin writers, and like the Lion, it was habitually seen in the Games of the Circus. No reference is made to it, however, in the Bible. The Jaguar (Felis onca) is sometimes called the American Tiger, and Felis macroleis, from the Malayan Peninsula, the Clouded Tiger.

2. Sugar: A tank having a perforated bottom, through which the molasses escape.

tiger-beetles, s. pl.

Entom.: The family Cicindelidae. [CICINDELA.]

tiger-bird, s.

tiger-cat, s.

Zool.: A popular name for any of the smaller felines, especially when the disposition of the darker coloration of the skin resembles that of the tiger (q.v.).

tiger-cowry, s. [TIGER-SHELL] tiger-flower, s.

Bot.: The genus Tigridia (q.v.), so called because the flowers are orange, yellow, and richly spotted.

* tiger-footed, a. Swift as a tiger; moving in bounds; hastening to seize one's prey.

"This tiger-footed Rage." Shakesp.: Coriolanus, III. 1.

tiger-leap, s. A bound or leap like that of a tiger on its prey.

"With a tiger-leap half way
Now she meets the coming prey."
Wordsworth: Edition & the Fulfilling Leaves.

tiger-lily, s.

Bot.: Lilium tigrinum, a fine lily, having scarlet spotted flowers, whence it is called also the tiger-spotted Lily. It is a native of China, but is now cultivated in American gardens. The bulbs are eaten in China and Japan.

tiger-moth, s.

Entom.: Arctia caja, a large fine moth, the male with pectinated antennae, the fore wings in both sexes brown, with numerous irregularly ramifying whitish streaks and spots, the hinder wings reddish orange with six or seven blue-black spots; expansion of wings, 2 1/2 to 2 3/4 inches. Larva black, with long white hairs on the back, reddish-brown ones along the sides and on the anterior segments; the head and legs black. It feeds on chickweed, dock-lettuce, and various low plants. The eggs are deposited in July and August; the larva lives through the winter, and when full grown is about two inches long. It spins a loose hairy web in July, and changes to a large dark smooth chrysalis. The Tiger Moth is common in Europe, and is sometimes called the Garden Tiger.

tiger-shark, s.

Ichthy.: Stegostoma tigrinum, a shark common in the Indian Ocean. Young specimens are generally met with close to the shore; but the full-grown fish, from ten to fifteen feet long, frequent the open sea. The colour is a yellowish brown, with black or dark-brown transverse bands or spots, whence the popular name. Called also Zebra-shark.

tiger-shell, tiger-cowry, s.

Zool.: Cypræa tigris. The dark markings, however, consist of dots, and not of stripes.

tiger-wolf, s. [THYLACINE].

tiger-wood, s. A valuable wood for cabinet-makers, imported from British Guiana. It is the heart-wood of Machaerium Schomburgkii.

tiger's foot, s.

Bot.: Iponoxea pes-tigridis. The stem and leaves are hairy; the flowers, which are involucrate, are small and white, with a tinge of purple. Common in India.

* ti-gör-än-tie, a. [Eng. tiger; -antic.] Ravenous as a tiger.
"The meridian of your tigerantio stomach."—T. Brown: Works, II. 179.
